here earlier in the year. Disgrunted U.S. officials had complained that the army and its officers lacked the qualities needed to win. The army was described as ı "9-to-5, five-day-a-week outfit." Now, U.S. advisers mostly call it a

"24-hour, seven-day-a-week army." Even more cynical foreign residents see changes for the better. Some Salvadoran officers in key positions are said to be more will ing to accept tactical and strategic advice from the U.S. and to be more aggressive. The advisers also are heartened because the once tiny officer corps trained at the Salvadoran military academy has been expanded by several hundred junior officers trained by U.S. instructors. "To a civilian it may sound strange," a U.S. adviser said, "but one encouraging sign is that second lieutenants are starting to die out there. That means they are making mistakes and their own mistakes are killing them, but they are leading the men and being aggressive. "Another indication of change is that you are starting to have friendly firelights,' or cases in which two army units wind up exchanging shots. That doesn't happen unless units are working at night and moving around." For now, the basis of the Nation-

As on the earlier days of protest, which began May 11, the sound of pots and pans being beaten rhyth-mically resounded throughout the capital of four million people and in other major cities, such as Concepción, Valparaiso and Temuco. This time the sound of the pots was accompanied by shots from automatic weapons, which could be heard late into the night.

Most of the persons who died were in the streets after the curfew began at 6:30 P.M. and were shot by military or national police pa-trols. Among those killed was an 8year-old girl in one of this city's

At his first press conference, Mr. Jarpa said he was prepared to negotiate with "all democratic forces that come with good intentions." He said it was possible for the regime to restore legal rights to political parties, which have been banned officially since 1973, and he held out the vague possibility of elections for a congress before the end of General Pinochet's presideptial term in 1989.

Christian Democratic Party leaders said they were prepared to open discussions with Mr. Jarpa, but they insisted on the need for the government to put aside the methods that General Pinochet has used to silence critics, including the exiling of prominent political and union leaders.

A spokesman for the National Mediation Board, Meredith S. Buel, said the two sides were not scheduled to resume face-to-face talks until afternoon, hours before the deadline set by the International Association of Machinists and Aerospace Workers. "Mediators have been in touch with the parties this morning," the spokesman said.

Continental, which recently merged with Texas International Airlines and moved its headquarters to Houston, was making plans to keep flights in operation in the event of a strike. The company's plans were based on the hope that uniquized pilots and flight attendants would not walk out.

Paraquat Used on Georgia Marijuana

ATLANTA (AP) — Helicopters began spraying paraquat Friday on marijuana fields in north Georgia in the first use of the berbicide by the federal government in the United States.

Governor Joe Frank Harris said the operation would send a message "that we're sick and tired of drug problems." He said he was satisfied that no wide hazard was posed by the use of paraquat, a federally licensed weed killer that can be dangerous if ingested.

Pete Charette, a special agent in the Atlanta office of the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration, said: "The controlled spraying will be in the north Georgia area. That's all I'm authorized to say."

WASHINGTON (NYT) — A senior interagency group has accepted a recommendation by Secretary of State George P. Shultz and Commerce Secetary Malcolm Baldrige to lift export controls on pipe-laying tractors to the Soviet Union, according to administration officials.

The action, which is expected to be approved by President Ronald Reagan, would help the Caterpillar Tractor Co., which is the principal maker of the equipment and which is competing for sales in the Soviet Union with the Komatsu Co. of Japan.

At a meeting Thursday, Mr. Shultz and Mr. Baldrige prevailed against opposition from the national security adviser, William P. Clark, and Defense Secretary Caspar W. Weinberger, the officials reported.

Warsaw Says 800 Have Been Freed

WARSAW (UPI) — Justice Ministry spokesmen said Friday that nearly 300 people, half of them political prisoners, have been pardoned and released during a new amnesty period.

Two-thirds of the way through the 30-day amnesty period, the officials said most cases had been decided. There was no word, however, on how many political prisoners would be denied amnesty.

At least 60 prisoners, among them former officials of the Solidarity union and leaders of the dissident Workers' Defense Committee, or KOR were expected to be betted from receiving a passion.

KOR, were expected to be barred from receiving a pardon. Protest May Turn Violent, Bonn Says

BONN (UPI) — Leftist extremists threaten widespread violence to coincide with the West German peace movement's nonviolent protests planned for this fall against NATO's deployment of U.S. cruise and Pershing-2 missiles, an Interior Ministry report said Friday.

The report warned that the Revolutionary Cells group, which is suspected of detonating two bombs at a U.S. Air Force officers' chib last week, was now waging an "armed struggle" against the NATO plans. The report blamed the Revolutionary Cells for 19 terrorist attacks this year. In addition, an independent wing of the peace movement comprising around 10,000 members threatens direct and violent confrontation with authorities, including the disrumtion of U.S. military transports and authorities, including the disruption of U.S. military transports and efforts to make "cities ungovernable," the report said.

Democracy in Nigeria

A blur called Chad has eclipsed the marvelous news from Nigeria, but marvelous that news is nonetheless: Millions of people, from widely different tribes and regions, have again ratified a democracy modeled on America's, freely choosing a president at the polls. The turbulent inability of impoverished Chad to agree on any government at all warrants barely a footnote by comparison.

Nigeria deserves applause and attention, especially from Americans. "We have the same kind of government here in Nigeria that you have in America," a voter recalled to Clifford May of The New York Times, "and we can handle elections just as well as you can." That is not only a proud boast. It is true enough to negate the cliché that Third World nations are incapable of constitutional self-rule.

No doubt there were irregularities in President Shehu Shagari's election to a second fouryear term. But his margin was substantial, and in any case he was opposed by serious contenders under a formula requiring him to win at least a quarter of the vote in 13 of 19 states. Considering Nigeria's diversity, its quarrel-some past and its troubled economy, the balloting was remarkable for its orderline What made it possible was the vision of General Olusegun Obasanjo, an African Cincinnatus who gave up the presidency four years ago to take up farming. He had managed the transition to democracy after a decade of military rule. It was he who urged the adoption of an American-style federal system in place of the parliamentary model that had been tried and found wanting.

So Nigeria owes more to James Madison than to John Stuart Mill or Karl Marx. In his famous Federalist No. 10, Madison saw in a large, well-constructed union the best antidote to the violence of faction: "The influence of factious leaders may kindle a flame within their particular states, but will be un-able to spread a general conflagration."

His thesis sensibly applies to Nigeria, with its 30 million people, three major tribal groups (Yorubas, Ibos and Hausas) and hundreds of smaller tribes in a country three times the size of South Africa. Its cohesion has been tested by civil war and rapid modernization.

A sag in oil prices has turned boom to bust, crippling development and doubling short-term debt. With the election over, Mr. Shagari may turn to the International Monetary Fund for the usual bail-out on the usual terms; a strong gulp of austerity. Americans can help Nigeria through its straits by providing more imaginative incentives and guarantees for private loans and investmen

There is no better bet in Africa than Nigeria, America's second most important source of imported oil. But a Reagan administration solicitous of South Africa seems almost to take Nigeria's stability and moderation for granted. Nigeria has looked to the United States for inspiration and for trade. It's time to repay the compliment.

Just Another General

The latest Latin coup underlines the sterility of this method of political change. The loser in Guatemala, General Efrain Rios Montt, was something of a loner, a professional soldier who broke the military establishment's rules and relied on younger officers and fellow members of his fundamentalist sect. The winner, General Oscar Humberto Meiia Victores. is an organization man who has served all previous masters, including the corrupt Lucas GarcIa and the eccentric Rios Montt, without visible scruples. "Above all," General Mejia Victores said upon assuming power, "it is necessary to preserve and fortify the unity of the army, maintaining the principle of hierarchy and chain of command." Think of it: a coup to maintain the chain of command.

Meaning perhaps to avoid one error committed by his predecessor, the new chief of state is retaining his old position as minister of defense. Otherwise he seems to be cut from the mold that has made the Guatemalan army the faithful servant of the country's landed rul class. He was the officer who actually led the forces that, in the name of combating "Marxist-Leninist subversion," killed thousands of asants, mostly underclass Indians, during the Rios Montt period. Those tactics made it politically impossible for the Reagan administration to follow its strategic proclivity and enlist Guatemala openly in the ranks of

General Mejia Victores was scarcely in the palace when he announced that he was ending some of the restrictions on civil liberties put in place by his predecessor. Almost by definition, however, no gesture that the reigning general can make with a stroke of the pen has much serious meaning. Nor is Guatemala's need a simple "restoration of civilian rule" according to the already agreed procedures that General Mejia Victores has now said he may expedite. The country has a frail and archaic political system representing or fronting for a power structure born in a now-indefensible earlier age. It takes a vivid imagination to expect this general to undertake the long, difficult renewal that must come to Guatemala some day. U.S. military aid to Guatemala ended in 1977, and already in some official quarters in Washington the argument is starting to perco-late that a resumption of aid would enable the United States to soften military rule and meanwhile to enjoy the benefits of fuller strategic cooperation. The old general, it is suggested, was an odd fellow; the new one is someone we can work with." It is a weak and distasteful argument. The United States has backed too many generals of the old school, in Guatemala and elsewhere, and there is no need to rush to take up another now.

Other Opinion

The French Role in Africa

President Mitterrand has shown courage in sending military aid to Chad. Some of the French Socialist government side with Colonel Qadhafi, and still more back him in quarreling with the United States. Chad is in dire need, France, which created

Chad and so many other weak pseudo-states, has the power and money to help. The French have long been active in former colonies, help ing governments that are free and able — like those of Senegal, Cameroon and the Ivory Coast. They contrast with the British, who, feeling racial guilt, have stood aside from the suffering of countries such as Uganda, for fear of seeming "neo-colonialist."

A Nordic Nuclear-Free Zone? The meeting of prime ministers of the Nor-dic countries which has just occurred in Helsinki resurrected the proposal for a Nordic nuclear-free zone. Promoted by the U.S.S.R. and its allies since the 1950s, it has had strong advocates in the Nordic countries themselve particularly in neutral Finland and Sweden. In the NATO members, Norway and Denmark, advocates of the proposal are also to be found. The appeal is emotional rather than logical.

The possibility, however remote, that NATO could be weakened by banning nuclear weapons from Norway and Denmark even in time of war is sufficiently attractive [to the Soviets] to be worth some effort. For NATO countries, the idea suffers from some fundamental defects. Soviet superiority in conventional forces would present an even greater threat, since NATO's flexibility in responding to aggression would be reduced and the deterrent effect of the alliance damaged. The Nor-dic countries would still be in danger of nu-clear attack because of the range of weapons deployed outside the nuclear-free zone.

For a Return to the Draft

By all reports, the volunteer nature of the [U.S.] armed forces has produced a high-quality defense establishment. But is it the best for the country? Or, said another way, what is being lost? Answer: Both the concept that service in the armed forces is a responsibility of all citizens and not just another job, and, most importantly, a deep commitment by the American people to the day-to-day requirements and operations of their armed forces and to the welfare of those who serve therein. There has been a definite separation, even isolation, of the military from the rest of society. Mainstreet U.S.A. seems willing to "let Joe do it" unless —or until — the armed forces fail in their principal mission: to deter war. Then, most would apparently agree on the need for a draft to obtain the personnel necessary to fight and win the war. It seems to us that a draft to maintain peace should be equally acceptable as a responsibility of citizenship.

1908: Lebanese Communities Unite BEIROUT - The enthusiasm which has reigned in Beirout, Syria, since that remarkable day, July 24, when the proclamation of the Constitution was officially declared has surpassed all predictions. Christians and Mohammedans, who a few days ago dared not lift their voice in complaint against the smallest official, have been parading the streets arm in arm with flags bearing the motto "Long live liberty; long live the army!" On Sunday the Mohammedans invited the Christians to their quarter, and about lifteen thousand of both parties swore a solemn oath to work hand in hand with the army in case anyone dared betray the Constitution. Indeed such was the harmony that an observer remarked that not since Mohammed declared himself as the messenger of Allah had such harmony existed.

1933: Cuban President Overthrown HAVANA -- President Gerardo Machado is the 13th Latin-American executive to be overthrown by violence since the economic depression began. In his case, as in that of many of the others, discontent was due to hard times coupled with an attempt by the ruler to perpetuate his stay in office by controlling elections and changing the constitution. The final break for Machado came when the army joined the hostile populace. Although he has achieved international notoriety as one of the most repressive dictatorships in Latin-American history, General Machado began his public career as a patriot, fighting in the army of liberation in 1895. When he became president in 1925, he enjoyed extraordinary popularity and esteem, but in two years he became the most cordially hated man on the island.

Central America, Afghanistan

AUSTIN, Texas — No analogies

Aure exact, but Soviet problems in Afghanistan may provide a more instructive parallel than Vietnam to U.S. problems in Central America.

The Afghan revolution of April 1978 succeeded because the Marxist-inclined factions were able to exploit increasing disaffection with social and economic conditions. The Kremlin did not trigger the revolution but of course welcomed the gratuitous extension of "socialism." Before long the ideological militan-cy of President Hafizullah Amin led to the disintegration of the revolu-tionary coalition, as the nationalists and the conservative tribes and mullahs who at first supported it became alienated from it. When insurgency showed that the country was turning hostile to the Soviet Union, the Russians tried to eliminate Mr. Amin. The attempt mistired. In nervous impetuosity, the Kremlin then launched the ill-fated military intervention.

Today, although the government installed by the Russians has retracted many socialist measures, it has not gained domestic legitimacy. The presence of "foreign infidels" has turned the insurgency into a holy crusade. What was a local irritant has become a running sore and an international embarrassment. The Soviet Union will not be defeated by the Afghan rebels, but the intervention has been a strategic and political disaster. It led to the shelving of the second strategic arms limitations accord, creation of the U.S. Rapid Deployment Force and an increased American presence in the Indian Ocean, and constituted a near-fatal blow to détente.

Moreover, it shattered the claims of communism as a principal supporter of peace, anti-imperialism and nonalignment. It revived the arms race in the subcontinent and invited overwhelming condemna-tion from the Islamic community and the United Nations.
Clearly, too, Afghanistan has become a quagmire for the Russians, who now use Western alarm at the intervention and covert CIA assistance to the rebels as justification for their continued presence. All this has lessons for the United States. In El Salvador, too, the insurgency won't go away. Honduras is being militarily bolstered as Pakistan was after the Soviet intervention in Afghanistan. The contras — the Nicaraguan counter-revolutionaries - are being trained and armed as the Afghan rebels and refugees were. Cuban support of the Sandinist government and Salvadoran guerrillas is as marginal as the outside backing for the Afghan rebels. A naval quaran-tine will not frighten the Sandinists into abdication but would probably strengthen their resolve and internationalize the conflict.

In a better world, each superpower could profit from studying the other's experience. They might find themselves in agreement that defiant nationalism is stronger than military power used to coerce small nations. They might even acknow-ledge to each other that all problems are not wholly or largely due to the other's conspiratorial malevolence.
They could both disengage with dignity by letting regional powers who have vital interests in peace and stability in their areas "circle the wagons" against all political and military interference. This is the role that the Contadora countries -Mexico, Venezuela, Colombia and Panama - seek to play in Central America and that the countries surrounding Afghanistan could work out for South and Southwest Asia.

In both Afghanistan and Central America, superpowers have fueled, not smothered, next-door nationalism. They would risk much less if they learned to live with it.

Crisis Here, Crisis There, Feeble Powers Everywhere

DARIS - Neither Chad nor El Salvador is a country of intrinsic importance beyond its borders. Both are cases of civil struggle in which outside powers have taken a bloody hand. The resemblances end there.

Chad is an invented country made up of two irreconcilable communities. In the north are Islamic nomads and semi-nomads of Arab and Berber origins, and in the south, sedentary agrarian Africans who are animist or Christian. There is no logical reason why they should have been put to-gether in a modern political entity called Chad, only the accidents of colonial history and decolonization.

But there they are, each struggling to dominate the other. Theirs is the underlying conflict, even though the present fight is led by two political figures of northern origin, Hissène Habre, the president, and Goukouni Oueddei, a former president.

There is nothing ideological in their conflict. They are two barons at war, and each takes what help he can war, and each takes what help he can get from whatever source. Each has his army, a few thousand men, and either could be (and in the past has been) routed by a modest deploy-ment of disciplined foreign troops. Colonel Moamer Qadhafi's contribution to the rebellion — troops, it is said, and weapons, vehicles and air support — can equally be countered by a minimal foreign intervention.

Libya, after all, is a society of 3 million people, only 20 years away from a poverty and illiteracy equivalent to Chad's today. It is not Sparta. The attention Libya gets in foreign capitals derives not from national accomplishment but from the press-worthy flamboyance of Colonel Qadhafi and from an obsession with him that has developed in Washington.

Speaking coldly, it makes little dif-ference who runs Chad, Mr. Habre or Mr. Gookouni, or even whether Colonel Qadhafi runs it. No one's rule is going to last more than a few years. The French care that reigning Afri-can authority not be toppled too ca-sually, because of the bad example to neighboring African countries in which the French have serious interests. Thus their grudging military commitment to Mr. Habre's survival. But the affair in Chad is two-

What American interests, if any, does he threaten? What is his standing at home, in the Arab world, in Africa? Will high-profile U.S. military responses such as dispatching carrier battle groups and AWACS aircraft to patrol Libya's shores and

The Reegan administration con-tends that Libya is a dangerous coun-try threatening such important American allies as Egypt and Nigeria and ultimately the Arab states in the Gulf. The reality is quite different.

In military terms, the Libyans are not in a position to contend with regional powers such as Egypt, Colonel Qadhafi may have spent as much as $12 billion on weapons in recent years, but his armed forces are badly trained and led. And with an estimated strength of only 65,000, the armed services are tiny compared with Egypt's 450,000 or even Morocco's 140,000 and Algeria's 168,000. Colonel Qadhafi might not want to risk fully mobilizing and arming his regular soldiers, because, as he has admitted, he does not trust them. His regional standing is an even greater obstacle to his hopes of expanding his influence beyond Libya's panding his introduce beyona Livya's borders and its tiny 2.5 million population. While posing as the gnardian of Abdel Gamal Nasser's legacy and the last apostic of Arab unity, he has managed to alienate or actually fight with every one of his neighbors. Coup attempts that he supported in Sudan in 1976 and in Tunisia in 1980 ended in miserable failure. He may even have benefited his sworn enemies, the Israelis, by sowing dissension in Arab circles and failing to honor commitments to the Arab confrontation states and the Palestine

Liberation Organization.
Having made himself a parish in the Arab world, the colonel turned to the African arena, in which generous distributions of cash initially won him some success. But last June the Organization of African Unity dealt him a humiliating defeat by denying him its chairmanship. Immediately change with unconscionable speed.

N EW YORK — Before pursuing afterward he touched off this latest coma of ma ddling in Chad. In a sense, Chad represents Colonel Qadhafi's last card, rather than his first step toward assembling an empire. Sadly, he has found that the weak, impoverished and often chaotic states of sub-Saharan Africa form the only area of the globe outside Libya that he can influence. His clients in those countries care nothing for his eccentric and simplistic ide ology recorded in the slim volumes called "The Green Book." They want money and arms, which can make a big difference in their internal fends. Chad is the perfect example. It is hard to see what interest America has to defend in Chad. What if Colonel Qadhafi installs his own man in Ndjamena? Since indepen-dence from France in 1960, Chad has been wracked by civil war. Why not let Colonel Qadhafi burn up his resources - which have been sharply curtailed by declining oil revenues -

by trying to keep order there? The rest of the central African states will not fall over like desert dominoes. If the Qadhafi record elsewhere is any indication, his involve-ment in Chad will innoculate against rather than spread his influence.

These highly publicized confrontations with America help rather than hurt Colonel Qadhafi at home. He has serious problems in Libya. There have been several reported assassingtion attempts against him. Many respected Libyan figures are working against him from exile. He has so far survived through luck and a pervasive security apparatus that depends heavily on his family, his tribe and East German intelligence personnel.
Libyans are unhappy about his repressive policies and the casualties in previous foreign adventures. But he can still whip up support to fight the ogre of American imperialism.

If the Reagan administration really wants to rid the world of Colonel Qadhafi, the best course may be to treat him as the nuisance he is rather than as a menace. Let him run wild in Chad and exhaust himself there.

JOHANNESBURG - The Lesotho government has alerted the United Nations and major Western countries, including the United States, that it can no longer resist South African military and economic pressures for it to expel up to 3,000 black South African refugees living there.

Spokesmen for the State Department and the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees confirmed this Thursday in Washington, and the Lesotho ambassador, M'Alineo Tan, said that the "pain-ful decision" had been made for the sake of national survival.

However, the Lesotho foreign minister, Evaristas R. Sekhonyana, said Thursday in a telephone interview from Maseru, Lesotho, that his government had not yet made a final decision and was "sensitizing" the world community to what it would have to do unless South Af-

Sutton House Stars In U.K. Exhibition

By Max Wykes-Joyce International Herald Tribune

UILDFORD, England - In G June 1520 a meeting was arranged, for the furtherance of universal peace and brotherhood, between their majesties Henry VIII of England and François I of France. The meeting place, subsequently titied by popular historians "The Field of Cloth of Gold," was the scene of a fortnight's jousting, wrestling, banqueting and dancing by the monarchs and their court-

Prominent among the 5,172 persons who accompanied the English king was Sir Richard Weston soldier, seaman, ambassador, governor, treasurer, and Gentleman of the Privy Chamber." In the next year, 1521, Sir Richard's long and faithful service to Henry VIII and his father Henry VII, was rewarded by the king's gift of the medieval manor and parkiand of Sutton, near Guildford, an ancient town in Surrey 29 miles (47 kilometers) from London. There Sir Richard built, alongside the old manor house, a splendid mini-palace of red brick with terracotta decora-

Sir Richard began to build the great house around 1525. It was finished before 1533, when the king came as a house guest. To celebrate the 450th anniversary of that visit, the Sutton Place Heritage Trust, established in 1982, "to preserve the atmosphere and character of an English country house and estate, and to ensure its continued existence as a source of social and cultural inspiration," has mounted a major loan exhibition, "The Reissance at Sutton Place," which runs through Sept. 15.

The show, organized by Benedict Shephard, divides for catalog purposes into 10 sections, though in practice these mingle pretty freely and complement one another

The Courts of Henry VII and Henry VIII" are represented by contemporary drawings of the long-disappeared Richmond Palace, drawings of courtiers in tournament armor, medallions, portraits of influential courtiers, and articles of table furniture. The "King's Palaces," mostly repre-sented by drawings and watercolors, and with a special section on Nonsuch, the building that remained unfinished at the king's death, exemplify Henry's passion for building (in 1509 he inherited 13 palaces from his father; at his death 38 years later, he left his son

The section on "The Courtier" includes a 16th-century tennis ball (leather stuffed with dog hair) and a pocket sundial (recently recovered from King Henry's flagship, the Mary Rose); while "Courtiers"

from Waltham Abbey, thimbles, knives, porringers, inkwells, purses, imported ceramics, and 16th-century armchairs. The chief exhibits representing "The Art of Renais-sance Warfare" are pieces of arms and armor, the masterpiece of which is the Milanese suit of armor made in 1545 for Henry II of France, bought from the Hever Castle sale in May for £1.9 million by the collector B.H. Trupin, and loaned by him to the Sutton Place show. And there is a section devoted to Queen Anne Boleyn and Sir Francis Weston, Sir Richard's son. who was one of the group of court-iers executed for alleged adultery with the queen, the pretext used by Henry for ridding himself of Anne Boleyn in favor of Jane Seymour.

Despite the execution of his son, Sir Richard remained on good terms with the king until his death in 1542, and Sutton Place stayed in the possession of his descendants until 1919, when it was sold to the Duke of Sutherland, who in turn sold it in 1959 to J. Paul Getty. In 1980, four years after Getty's death, it was leased to the American businessman and collector Stanley J. Seeger, who two years later set up the Sutton Place Heritage Trust.

This explanation is necessary because, as one of the introductory essays to the catalog notes, "The principal exhibit in The Renaissance at Sutton Place' is the house itself." The house has been fully restored by Sir Hugh Casson, and the grounds and gardens re-landscaped by the doyen of English landscape designers, Sir Geoffrey Jellicoe to incorporate a sculpture wall by Ben Nicholson; a Miró swimming pool garden; the Para-dise Garden, "a concept of heaven brought to earth . . . purely to at-tract you with the sound of waters, and arbors and bird life," which leads in turn to the Moss or Secret Garden, which aims to recreate the spirit of a fairy painting by Atkinson Grimshaw in the Seeger Collection, which is on permanent loan to

The number of visitors to the exhibition, house, and its grounds is limited and prior notice is obligatory. Visits can be arranged, for individuals or groups, Tuesday through Saturday, by telephoning the Booking Secretary, Guildford (0483) 504-455 between 10 A.M. and 4 P.M.

An excursion to Sutton Place is intended to be, not just a trot round a show of art and artifacts in rural setting, but a total experience of the kind which inspired Henry VIII himself to poetry:

I love and shall until I die. Grudge who lust, but none deny, So God be pleased, thus live will I.

In June, however, it was the turn of an English rococo ewer no longer predetermined by a given and basin made by George Wickes in 1737. They sold at Sotheby's for a fantastic £176,000. This time comments focused on the rarity of English rococo and the quality of this particular basin, arguably the masterpiece of its style. True again. But the fact is that a decade ago rarity never lead to such prices. And three Queen Anne casters sold as a set for £96,800 — also a record in its way - were beautiful but not quite so rare. A series of records was achieved last season, of which the Hever Castle offered the most astonishing case. An unusually large French ivory casket dated by Sotheby's to the 14th century made £418,000. Equally impressive prices were achieved by furniture at various points. In November, Christie's scored with a marvelous Louis XVI period secretary in black lacquer with ormolu mounts. It made £626,400 for its Iranian owner, who had bought it for £126,400 in 1972. The Calder exhibition in the Palazzo a Vela, which runs through Sept. 25, is built on a scale people can't afford to insure any more. Phillip Borsos' Canadian film, "The Grey Fox," is "a leisurely paced western with one terrific asset: Richard Farnsworth," writes Vincent Canby of The New York Times. Farnsworth, a stuntmanturned-actor, plays an old stagecoach robber at the turn of the century who tries to come to terms with the Age of Steam by adapting his thieving ways to train robberies. He falls in love with a feminist photographer (Jackie Burroughs) while hiding out in a small town in British Columbia, and, Canby writes, "They make a very attrac-tive couple." P OKYO - One of the beamsing questions Lof archaeology is that of Japan's cultural indebtedness to Korea. While Asian archaeologists and historians have made the assumption based on their discoveries that much of Japan's early civilization is derived from the Korean peninsula, the Japanese citizen does not. Fed's Concern About Money Supply May Bode III for the U.S. Economy

PRINCETON, New Jersey — In case you have not been keeping score, be informed that the monetary aggregates have been growing at juncy rates in recent months. Fed Chamman Paul Volcker is concerned about this. I am concerned about his concern.

The Pederal Reserve has had a great deal of experience with monetarism in recent years. Why look for more? Presumably, the monetary aggregates — the Ms — are not goals in themselves, but only instruments for controlling something that matters, like gross national product. But GNP is the product of money times velocity, so GNP growth stems both from growth of money and growth of velocity. If velocity drops, the money supply must grow faster, or the economy will stagnate. And it just so happens that velocity has been falling rapidly in recent

The monetarist belief in steady money growth presumes that ve-locity growth is either stable or highly predictable. A few years ago this doctrine seemed dubious. Now it is ridiculous. Deregulation and rapid financial innovation continue to transform the ways

Let us consider the recent high monetary growth rates in this light. Let us consider the recent high monetary growth rates in this light. Since November 1982, M-2 has grown at a 16-percent annual rate, a sharp acceleration from the 9-percent rate recorded during the previous 12 months. Is this cause to sound the inflationary alarms? Hardly. In December 1982 a new type of bank account called a money market deposit account (MMDA) was authorized. These accounts proved to be very popular. In less than seven months balances in MMDAs grew from deposit a deposit and the seven months of the seven to more than $360 billion.

Now it happens that the Fed decided to put MMDAs into M-2, which have shown at an annual seven months of the seven months of t Now it happens that the Fed decided to put MMDAs into M-2, which he gap which he gap with the first of the which he gap with the first of the second of M-2 that excluded MMDAs would have grown at an annual transition of M-2 that excluded MMDAs would have grown at an annual transition of M-2 that excluded MMDAs would have grown at an annual transition of M-2 that excluded MMDAs would have grown at an annual transition of M-2 that excluded MMDAs would have grown at an annual transition of M-2 that excluded MMDAs would have grown at an annual transition of the manual transition of M-2 that excluded MMDAs would have grown at an annual transition of M-2 that excluded MMDAs would have grown at an annual transition of M-2 that excluded MMDAs would have grown at an annual transition of M-2 that excluded MMDAs would have grown at an annual transition of M-2 that excluded MMDAs would have grown at an annual transition of M-2 that excluded MMDAs would have grown at an annual transition of M-2 that excluded MMDAs would have grown at an annual transition of M-2 that excluded MMDAs would have grown at an annual transition of M-2 that excluded MMDAs would have grown at an annual transition of M-2 that excluded MMDAs would have grown at an annual transition of M-2 that excluded MMDAs would have grown at an annual transition of M-2 that excluded MMDAs would have grown at an annual transition of M-2 that excluded MMDAs would have grown at an annual transition of M-2 that excluded MMDAs would have grown at an annual transition of M-2 that excluded MMDAs would have grown at an annual transition of M-2 that excluded MMDAs would have grown at an annual transition of M-2 that excluded MMDAs would have grown at an annual transition of M-2 that excluded MMDAs would have grown at an annual transition of M-2 that excluded MMDAs would have grown at an annual transition of M-2 that excluded MMDAs would have grown at an annual transition of M-2 that excluded MMDAs would have grown at an annual transition of M-2 that excluded MMDAs would hav

The other popular monetary aggregate is M-1. During the 12 months ending in June 1982, M-1 grew 5.4 percent. Then from June 1982 to June 1983 it grew at a whopping 12.9-percent annual rate, causing much consternation among monetarists. a a manum plates 🔄 and lacel for 🐋

Here the explanation is less clear, but December 1982 also marked the building is introduction of Super NOW accounts. These accounts are included in a component of M-I that the Fed calls "Other Checkable Deposits." By no an i in building je " of any took code: coincidence, the annual growth rate of Other Checkable Deposits from June 1982 to June 1983 was 39 percent. Had these deposits been excluded from M-1, the recorded M-1 growth rate would have been only 6.6 or Mader occepte: percent.

Vivid Example

On the other hand, had the Fed put the MMDAs into M-1, the recorded growth rate of M-1 would have been 94 percent. Thus, depending on some subtleties of definition, the Fed could have reported an M-1 standarding growth rate anywhere between 6.6 percent and 94 percent.

There is obviously room for fun with numbers here. But I've done enough to illustrate how meaningless monetary growth numbers can be during a period of rapid financial change.

The last quarter of 1981 and the first quarter of 1982 provide a vivid historical example. During those two quarters M-1 grew at a 7-percent rate. Reasonable, right? Wrong, because M-1 velocity fell at a 6-percent rate, leaving the annual growth rate of nominal GNP a scant 1 percent. The consequence was a 5-percent rate of decline of real GNP and a History might have repeated itself a year later had the Fed stubbornly adhered to monetarist dogma. During the fourth quarter of 1982 and the first quarter of 1983, M-1 velocity fell at an 8-percent annual rate. Fortunately, Mr. Volcker had renounced monetarism - temporarily, he said — in October 1982, and M-I was allowed to grow at a 14-percent rate. So nominal GNP was at least permitted to grow at a mediocre 5.3percent pace. Real economic performance during the two quarters was

The moral of the story is clear: He who targets on the growth rate of money when velocity is behaving erratically is looking for trouble.

Therein lies my worry. Mr. Volcker has recently amounced that the Red intends to have a secure of the story and the story of t Fed intends to bring money growth rates back into line with targets. If the Fed returns to M-fetishism, look out. For as long as velocity keeps declining, seemingly high money growth rates are not only appropriate but actually essential if recession is to be avoided.

In view of our experience with monetarism, perhaps the surgeon general should require that Mr. Volcker's cigar wrappers carry a warning: Monetary targets can be hazardous to the economy's health."

Harris-Lanier Match Is Raising Eyebrows

MIAMI — Can Harris Corp., marketer of sophisticated computers for the professional, find happiness with Lanier Business Products, purveyor of copiers and a catalogue of relatively unsophisticated office equipment? Officials at the two companies, understandably, believe that the pending acquisition of Lanier by Harris is a good one.

But the stock market appears relatively unimpressed with the agreement. Harris shares, which traded at 548.50 just before the the transaction was announced on July 22, have dropped more than 10 points since then.

And some Securities analysis are concerned that the product lines of the two companies are a mismatch and that their sales forces may not be able to cope with the differences.

Harris's chairman, Joseph Boyd, says the Lamer acquisition will provide a much needed entry into the low-end, word-processor market.

"This allows us to now target the complete spectrum of chents, from the lawyer's office to the major business, with a sales force that rivals our nearest competitors," he said.

The acquisition, expected to be approved at back-to-back shareholder meetings in late October, will be made in a stock transaction currently valued at about $320 million, with Harris issuing 0.525 common share for each Lamier share outstanding. Before the price of Harris shares began dropping the stock transfer involved in the merger had been valued at about $375 million.

Lamer, in any case, will retain its name after the merger and be erratically is looking for operated as a Harris subsidiary. Lanier's chairman, Gene W. Milner, will continue to head the company and is expected to be named to the Harris board. He has been quoted as saying that Harris represented a chance for his company to merge with one that had a strong research department in the office-automation field.

But some analysts are wondering whether the Lanier sales force, which has effectively sold office products such as dictation equipment and copiers for years, can upgrade to the type of sophisticated computer that Harris has become known for-

"I'm on the fence regarding just how this helps Harris," said Stephen McClellan, an analyst with Salomon Brothers. "The way I see it, there isn't much synergism." He said Lanier's low-end office automation and word processors are wholely different from Harris' high-end sophisticated technology. "I guess I wonder if Lanier's sales force can handle a sophisticated product line for their customer base," he said.

Mr. McClellan added, however, that "Lanier is a very fine company. It's a first-class operation," with a very healthy balance sheet.
"The major objection I hear is that the Lanier sales force is low-end

Producer Prices In U.S. Climbed By 0.1% in July

By Sally Jacobsen

WASHINGTON -- U.S. wholesale prices rose 0.1 percent in July as food costs tumbled for the third month in a row, the government said Friday. Economists called the report encouraging but tempered their enthusiasm with warnings that summer drought may drive up food costs sharply next year.

Through July, wholesale prices had fallen at an annual rate of 0.7 percent, heightening economists' expectations that those prices will rise this year at their slowest rate in two decades. They increased 3.7 percent in 1982, the latest inflation report during a speech Friday in Tampa, Florida, and said, "We are on the right

Noting that the inflation increase was the lowest for a 12month period in 16 years, Mr. Rea-gan said, "We are launched into a solid recovery.

The tiny gain posted last month in the Labor Department's Produc-er Price Index for finished goods was due not only to falling food prices but also to a moderation of energy costs. Those prices only advanced 0.2 percent in the new report after jumping sharply in the previous two months.

cent after a sharp 5.1-percent increase in the June report. Analysts say gasoline prices actually began slipping in early August after consumers failed to use as much gasoline as had been expected. Food costs fell 0.6 percent last month, the same as in June. Economists predicted further declines in food prices this year but then looked for sizable increases in 1984 because of the damaging effect on grain crops of the scorching beat and of the Reagan administra tion's decision to reduce crop production.

As a result, Donald Ratajczak, President Ronald Reagan cited economic forecaster at Georgia State University, said the July report "is good [but] it's not going to last too many months longer."

Added Michael Evans, president of the Washington consulting firm of Evans Economics, "We're just buying time." Mr. Ratajczak predicted that retail prices of food would increase about 2.5 percent this year, then soar 7 percent next year.

The lower grain production will show up most noticeably in meat prices, which should continue falling this year before picking up in 1984, analysts said.

Mr. Ratajczak said he expects a 1.4 percent increase in wholesale prices this year. Should that occur, it would be the best showing since the 0.5 percent advance of 1964. Over the past year, wholesale prices have risen just 1.4 percent .-

To Discuss Bank-Debt Rescheduling

LONDON (Reuters) - Poland agreed to meet Western creditor banks on Tuesday in Vienna to discuss their proposal for rescheduling the country's 1983 bank debt. An agreement could be concluded soon, banking sources said Friday.

The banks delivered a firm proposal last month, but Poland replied earlier this week only by asking for a further meeting. Banks conducting the talks then said a meeting would not be held until Poland replied firmly on terms by Friday. Some bankers observed that by agreeing to the meeting. Poland in effect had accepted the basic terms.

The banks, through the small working party coordinating negotiations, had proposed that 95 percent of Poland's $1.5 billion in principal due this year be rescheduled over 10 years, with a five-year grace period on principal repayments. The banks would receive an interest rate of 1% percentage points over the London interbank offered rate for Eurodolla deposits, and a one-percentage-point rescheduling fee, bankers said.

Poland would be required to pay 1983 interest of $1.1 billion, but would receive 60 percent of this back as short-term trade credit.

$_{M_1}$ SEC Seeks Tighter Schwab Controls

LOS ANGELES (LAT) - Saying that Charles Schwab & Co.'s "grossly negligent" supervision of its branch in Newport Beach, California, in 1980 allowed one of its salesman to operate an $850,000 fraud scheme from his desk, the Securities and Exchange Commission staff has asked that the company be barred from opening any new branch offices

Brazil, IMF Reach Poland Is to Meet Creditors Tuesday Tentative Accord

By Caroline Arkinson Washington Post Service

WASHINGTON - Brazil has reached a tentative new agreement with the International Monetary Fund that should open the way later this year to renewed lending by the IMF and international nkers, according to the Brazilian finance minister, Ernane Galvêas.

A team of IMF officials that has been in Brazil negotiating the details of the package was to return to Washington to present the agreement to the IMF's managing direc-tor, Jacques de Larosière. If he approves the plan, it will go to the ocard of executive directors for a final decision in October, sources

In making the announcement, Mr. Galveas told reporters Thurs-day that he hoped the IMF would mercial banks to resume their leading by the end of

Brazil, which owes close to $90 billion overseas, has been hovering on the edge of bankruptcy all year. It is more than $1.5 billion behind in its foreign payments to banks and suppliers, sources say. These arrears would climb to more than $2 billion by the end of September if the nation gets no new money between now and then, and to al-most $2.5 billion by year-end, ac-cording to estimates being made in

The cash squeeze became more cute after the end of May, when the IMF stopped paying install-ments on a three-year $4.9 billion loan because Brazil failed to meet tough economic conditions set by the IMF. Since then, Brazil has been locked in negotiations with the IMF on a new loan agreement. Commercial bankers, who were already uneasy about Brazil's financial and economic package, stopped paying out on a medium-term loan for $4.4 billion when Brazil failed to comply with the IMF program.

The Brazilian government finally agreed last month to IMF demands for a modification in the country's wage and salary laws that have been compensating workers fully for inflation, which is now running at nearly 150 percent a year.

But the military government's decision to change these laws, which would lead to real wage reductions, came amid growing domestic opposition to the economic

The change in the law has to go through the Brazilian congress, which can choose not to vote on it. If that happens, the decree would automatically become law but only after a delay of 60 days. The IMF likely would not consider the new agreement until it has been cleared by congress, monetary sources say.

Strong political opposition to further painful economic measures delayed the government's agreement to other IMF demands for further spending cuts and anti-inflation measures, and opposition Thursday that the whole IMF agreement be presented to congress ratification. There have been growing demands in Brazil for a moratorium on debt repayments.

Meanwhile, Mr. de Larosière has become tougher in seeking the new package after the failure of the first one, sources said. A senior Washington official commented that when things become undone" once, "then you want actions rather MOSCOW — The growth in Soviet industrial output slowed to 3.8 percent during the January to July peniod, according to figures released Friday.

The seven-month growth figure, included in a report by the Central Statistics Board, was the first this year to fall below four percent and continued a negative trend that began last spring.

At the start of the year, Soviet comparative indicators for the first six months of 1983 were a 4.1 growth rate and a 3.3-percent increase in labor productivity.

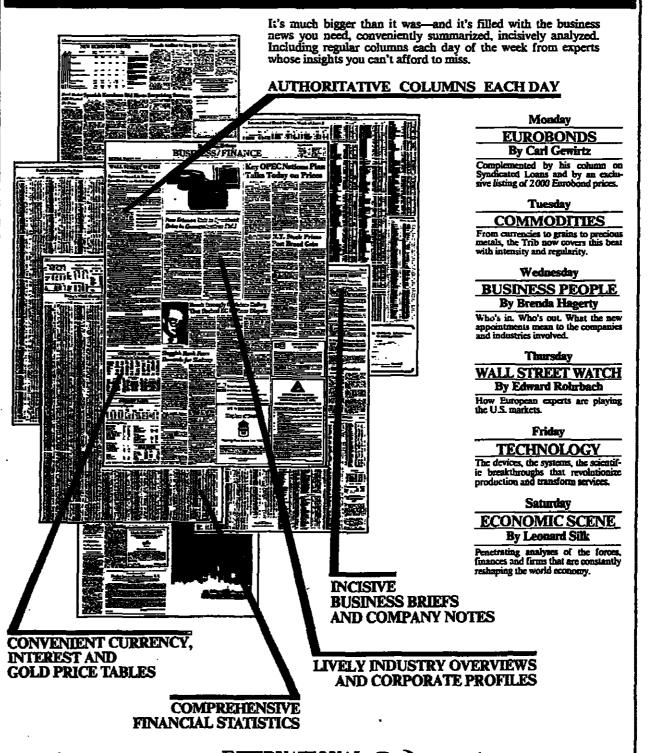

The Central Statistics Board said that the majority of industries had surpassed their plan targets in July.

But it reported that in a large number of key sectors—including the oil refining and factory production of gas and oil pipes, tractors and cement — results had worsened from those of previous

LEAD TIME: A Journalist's Education

GARRY Wills's new book is a collection of pieces about American society and politics and presidents, published over the past 15 years by one of our most penetrating commentators and

In form it is not a memoir, despite the subtitle implications; but perhaps it is one in spirit, though only to a limited — and limiting — degree. The new journalism, after all, uses the journalist's person to measure the event. With a practitioner as sophisticated and large-spirited as Wills, the person includes a whole sensibility and an autobiography as

So much of the writer's life goes into the immedi acy of new journalism that when it comes time to do slept in, and dreamt in as well. A journalist wears out his experience, just as a novelist wears out his imagination, practicing his trade. It is rare to find

And so Wills gives us articles instead. His education was wide-ranging and active, but his "Educa-tion" is his journalism. He has written with vividness and originality about presidents, political conventions, the civil rights and anti-war movements, religious fundamentalism and other warm-either one behind the very best memoirs.

water currents that churn to the surface of our continental chill.

By the mark Christianity has made, Wills answers, by his admiration for such believing minds as those of St. Augustine and Dietrich Bonhöffer, and —he is seized by the example of Christ choosing to die between two thieves and comforting them as He died - "by listening for a promise from my fellow crook."

The "fellow crook" line is characteristic. Wills is in an American tradition that goes from H.L. Mencken to Jimmy Breslin; announcing tenderness with tough words, possessing an odd affection for the extremes of rascality — when he does a Nixon or a Bobby Baker his rigor has a touch of sympathy — and an utter abhorrence for the fads of the upper

He tries — gulping a bit — to insist upon the power and sincerity of a Charles Colson converted to fundamentalism; he cannot abide the velvet quality of the glove covering what he regards as Pope John Paul IPs iron pastoral fist. He is a perpenually protesting Catholic, and his article on the pope's visit to the United States points out some comically bloated examples of the press's uncritical lyricism. He does come down rather hard, though, on one journalist who simply noted the color contrast of John Paul's crimson tunic on a gray day. Wills suspects him of suggesting that it was the sun bursting through the clouds.

Solution to Last Week's Puzzle

The main difficulty with "Lead Time" is that of any collection of old journalistic pieces. Written for impact on their time, they date badly. The portraits of such figures as Bert Lance, Spiro Ag-new, John Mitchell; the description of old political conventions or of a joint appearance by Senators Moynihan and Hayakawa don't have much life left in them; neither does his account of being arrested along with other writers in a 1972 war-protest demonstration. And, akin to the notion of week-old lilies stinking worse than weeds, the very ingennities and nuances of Wills's writing often accentuate the

His preface, ironically, touches on the point. It is a provocative discussion of the emergence of the new journalism in such magazines as Esquire during the '60s. American life had become such a mackstrom of change, he writes, that magazines whose "lead time" — the interval between submitting an article and having it appear — was several months; needed a kind of writing that would take a longer look, a more intellectually and emotionally vigorous approach to matters that might have changed utterly by publication day. It was an approach that could keep a student rict fresh from January to June -but not from 1976 to 1983. Lead time does, in fact, overtake a good deal of "Lead Time." There is an arresting and ingenious comparison of Reaganism and the Counter-Reformation. Both were efforts to restore an old belief — political in this case, instead of religious — against new developments of the spirit and the mind. Wills makes a compelling argument that Reaganism derives its strength not from particular policies but from a rooted desire to believe in America as a fixed principle of virtue and order.

Better than the argument are the patches of erudite and marvelously comic example. I particu-larly like his comparison of the neo-conservatives to the Jesuits, employed after the Council of Trent to maintain the old faith with modern arguments. And his vision of the CIA as a medieval monastic order, beleaguered by Lutheranism — in this case the short-lived investigatory furor of post-Watergate — then honkering down, and surviving.

Grumble as he may, he asserts that he has no difficulty accepting the leadership of the pope over his church. "But I find it a little burdensome," he-adds, with the Tridentine Reagan in mind, "to

Semifinals Begin for America's Cup NEWPORT, Rhode Island (NYT) — Under cloudy skies with scat-

With a southeasterly breeze of 14 to 17 knots, Australia II and Canada

I had a close match for the first three legs of the 24-mile (39-kilometer) course. But on the fourth leg, Canada I experienced difficulties and lowered its genoa, a large forward sail. After falling more than seven minutes behind Australia II, Canada I withdrew on the last leg. Australia II's cumulative record now is 37-4.

In the second match, Victory '83, the British entry, sailed the course alone when Azzurra of Italy withdrew after 10 minutes into the first leg because of rigging problems. Gianfranco Alberini, chairman of the Italian syndicate, said that Azzurra had broken a jumper, which is the uppermost spreader, but the mast was not damaged.

Peete and Weibring Share Golf Lead

GRAND BLANC, Michigan (AP)—Calvin Peete, bidding to become the first black to win $1 million on the PGA Tour, fired a 6-under-par 66 Thursday to share the first-round lead with D.A. Weibring at the Warwick Hills Golf & Country Club.

Peete, who was born in Detroit, about 60 miles (96 kilometers) away, hit all 18 greens in regulation while carding three birdies on the front nine and three more on the back side. Weibring carded nines of 32-34 on the 7.001-vard course.

Peete has earned $968,605 since joining the tour in 1975. First prize here is $63,000, with the runner-up getting $37,800. One stroke behind the co-leaders, were John Cook, Fred Couples, Jack Renner and Chi Chi

PARIS POSTCARD

To the Opera Barricades

By Mary Ellen Bortin

PARIS — A second Bastille uprising is brewing among Parisians upset over government plans to build a new "popular" opera house at the historic prison site, the birthplace of the French revolu-

The blueprint for the future "Opéra de la Bastille" is expected to be selected within the next few weeks by President François Mitterrand, who says he is determined to see the project through despite France's economic difficulties.

But although the architect has not yet been chosen, critics are asking whether Paris is ready for "pop op" — classical opera made popular through greater accessibility to

Pointing to other recent steeland-glass constructions around Paris, they say the new opera would deface a colorful quarter of artisans and workshops and that it would be an expensive and unnecessary addition to the city's cultural scene.

Plans for the Bastille opera began taking shape in 1981 as part of the Socialist government's drive for a "cultural revolution" aimed at popularizing elitist arts and recap-turing the dominance of Paris as the world's cultural capital.

"We want to create a functional, modern theater of lyric art which will triple the number of opera seats in Paris," François Bloch-Laine, who heads the Bastille project, said.

He said renovation of the existing opera house, the omate Palais Garnier, opened in the heart of the city in 1875, had been ruled out on grounds of cost.

The demand for tickets far exceeds the available seats at the Palais Garnier, and poor sight lines in the auditorium of less than 2,000 seats block all view of the stage from 400 low-cost seats.

The new opera is to house a main theater with 2,700 to 3,000 seats, a 1,500-seat adjustable theater, and rehearsal stages.

For the same state subsidy, we will be able to increase the number of spectators from 300,000 to I million, with opera at the Bastille and dance at the Palais Garnier," Bloch-Laine said.

But opponents of the project, citing France's huge budget deficit, say the 2 billion francs (about $250 million) earmarked for building the new opera may disappear long before its scheduled completion in

They also question the choice of the Place de la Bastille, now a vast traffic circle in the east of Paris, bordered by the Faubourg Saint-Antoine area which spawned the 1789 revolution at the gates of the

The area has in recent years be come a center of the city's artistic activity, with painters, sculptors and musicians renovating centuries-old workshops and injecting new life into the quarter.

To make room for the new opera.

directors of the project plan to raze a disused railway station, a cinema a restaurant, and a block of ancient, narrow apartment buildings that many feel add to the charm of the neighborhood.

The 200 residents of the demolition zone are to be rehoused by the city, but some have formed an association to press for the project to be relocated, if not scrapped entirely. "It seems unrealistic for an opera to receive such a high concentration of spectators daily in an inaccessible area where the most evocative part of the past is to be demolished," a critic in the Paris newspaper Le Monde wrote. But organizers of the project. billing it as "the architectural and cultural event of the late 20th century," say the opera house will make an exciting addition to an area which lacks any major cultural

They say three underground railway lines with stations at the Bastille station make it accessible from all parts of Paris.

We are not rich at the moment and maybe it would be better not to spend the money on this," Bloch-Laine said. "But the Palais Garnier can no longer be used for opera in

President Mitterrand said last month he would forge ahead with construction of the Bastille opera despite the recent cancellation of plans for a universal exhibition in Paris in 1989 due to economic and political difficulties.

He now has to choose one of six plueprints selected by an international jury from 750 entries by ar-chitects from around the world. He is expected to annou

On the Trapeze With Anthony Burgess

By Herbert Mitgang New York Times Service

TEW YORK - Not for the IN first time, Anthony Burgess, best known for that controversial novel and film, "A Clockwork Orange," finds that he has to explain what he's up to creatively these days. Some of the critics were underwhelmed by his current movel, "The End of the World News," wondering about its multimedia style. Divided into three parts, the novel includes a Broadway musical comedy about Leon Trotsky, a "televisualized" life of Sigmond Frend and a science-fiction tale of the planet Earth clobbered by an intruder from a distant galaxy.

And so, in New York the other y, Burgess chain-lighted Dutch Schimmelpennincks and ex-plained himself.

"Modern fiction is a lying craft with no pretensions to exact knowledge. Plansibility is very nearly all. A novelist may check in a cheap encyclopedia objective data — details of the sinking of the Titanic - as he needs for his narrative, but his art is a very tentative one and depends largely on guesswork about how the human mind operates.

"Nothing could be less scholarly than the average novel, even where its basis is a historical fact. A number of 20th-century novelists, copying Nabokov and Borges, make parodic scholarship an aspect of their artistic seriousness. The povelist is a confidence trickster, while it is the task of the 26 novels with that specific notice book combines family anecdotes scholar to abhor trickery and

So much for his personal vi-sion, but what about "The End of the World News"? He said: "The three stories in the novel are all the same story. They are all about the end of history as man has known it.

A key to Burgess's work gener-ally can be found in that umbrella word, entertainment. In fact, he subtitles this novel "An Enterainment." By contrast, his British neighbor on the Riviera, Graham Greene, dropped the word "Entertainment," as a description of his early thrillers, from the most recent listing of his books. Burgess added that he had a right to label his books any way he

to the reader.

The theatricality of the novel derives from the author's own background as a serious, selftaught musician. His composi-tions include songs, concertos, sonatas and incidental music for plays. In fact, Burgess is one of the few trans-Atlantic triplethreat men of letters who moves from one entertainment form to another - books, movies, symphonics — without missing a beat. In conversation, he talks like a musician about the music in writing and like a novelist about the writing in music.

He is combing his two interests, writing and music, in an au-tobiography, "This Man and Mu-sic," to be published next with his musical adventures — "the literary intentions of music and the musical intentions of li-

Burgess recalls family parties around the piano at Christmastime in his youth in Manchester. "Everybody had his or her own song. I remember a priest singing, "Be Mine, My Margnerite," and even my stepmother giving out with, We'll be merry, drinking whisky, wine and sherry, all be merry, on Coronation Day."

If Burgess could wish upon a star, his big work in 1984 wouldn't be a book but an opera, preferably grand. He believes that there's nothing unliterary about entertaining (that word again) the reader or listener or tences."

viewer. And he talks of writing a Jane Austen novel in the form of a Mozart symphony.

Inevitably, his music is more structured than his full-time business of inventing stories. He links words and music: a novel, he says, is like a symphony, a no-

"Christopher Marlowe was one of the few writers who could bring off blank verse," Burgess said. "There's music in his line: Was this the face that launched a thousand ships? A great man, Marlowe — dead at 29, stabbed to death in a tavern by double agents. Probably was one himself. Ben Jonson could also get the beat right in his prose: In Naples did I learn to poison flowers.' Jonson once killed a fellow actor in a duel. Writers in the old days brawled for their work."

But not now. Burgess offered an analogy from still another art form, the circus, to describe what's happening to writers today.

"We're all on a trapeze. You're with a publisher, the editor leaves, your book may or may not remain, suddenly you find your book swinging between two dif-ferent houses. The situation in America for modern British authors calls for certain limited themes. Espionage. John Le Carré. Fiction about defecting diplomats, like my distant cousin, Guy Burgess. We don't have many good British writers around. Henry James couldn't make it today.

Burgess believes some of the old warhorses of grand opera ought to be brought up to date. He said there are endless possibilities for rescuing opera from its tired, dated themes. "Oscar Hammerstein did it with 'Carmen Jones' and I myself have taken a new approach to 'Rigoletto.'"
And how has he helped Verdi? Well, I've turned 'Rigoletto' into a Mafia story." Burgess relighted his cigar and declared, "Literature and music depend totally on your sensibi-lity. I find the sound of music in George Bernard Shaw, James Joyce and Gerard Manley Hopkins. Unfortunately, many writers today have music neither in their souls nor in their sen-

"I had a spasm in my leg and l suppose it's a tear," a subdued Nureyev, 45, said from his hotel room where doctors ordered him to rest for a week. He injured the left call during Wednesday night's preview, but finished the show. The Russian-born dancer, who starred in the Kirov Ballet before defecting in 1961, had planned "Don Quixote" as his last production before be-

That's what radiation is. It in effect burns the cancer off the face. It doesn't hurt," Mrs. Stewart said. Nigerian Voters Re-elect Shagari by Wide Margin

By John de St. Jorre

LAGOS, Nigeria - President Shehu Shagari won a second fouryear term Thursday with a sweep-ing victory in Nigeria's first civilian-run elections since the army returned the country to democratic tule in 1979. The results, announced in the early morning by the Federal Electoral Commission, put Mr. Shagari, 58, ahead of his nearest opponent, Obafemi Awolowo, 74, by more than four million votes. Mr. Shagari also satisfied the constitutional Drovision that a winner must have at least 25 percent of the vote in two-thirds of Nigeria's 19 states.

He achieved that figure in 16 states. Speaking on the radio, Mr. Sha-gari called the result "a victory for all Nigerians, a victory for de racy." He reaffirmed that Africa would remain the focus of Nigeria's foreign policy, "opposing racism, apartheid and colonialism."

The final results came amid accusations by Mr. Shagari's rivals of vote-rigging and intimidation. Two of the president's opponents took legal action in an attempt to prevent the results from being published in states where they alleged irregularities had occurred.

The electoral commission ignored their protests but ordered new elections in three towns in the

Israel Tells McFarlane It Is Still Committed to Partial Lebanon Pullout

By Edward Walsh Washington Past Service

JERUSALEM - Against the backdrop of mounting violence in Lebanon, Israel reiterated Thursday its determination to go through with a partial pullback of its forces in Lebanon in the coming weeks.

Israeli officials said Foreign Minister Yitzhak Shamir stressed this position Thursday in a meeting more shelling in the Beirut area, with the U.S. special envoy, Robert C. McFarlane, who renumed here on the regime. after a weeklong tour of Arab capitals. Mr. McFarlane, in turn, told Mr. Shamir and later Prime Minister Menachem Begin that there had been "no movement" toward gaining Syrian agreement to withdraw from Lebanon, the officials said.

These accounts of Mr. McFarlane's meetings here deepened the impression that there is no end in sight to the troop withdrawal staletime internal pressure is growing on the Lebanese government of President Amin Gemayel.

Mr. McFarlane, named last month to replace Philip C. Habib as President Ronald Reagan's special Middle East envoy, hopes eventually to win Syria's agreement to withdraw its forces from Lebanon, a condition Israel is insisting on before it will withdraw its troops entirely. But since Mr. McFarlane arrived in the Middle East more than a week ago, the deteriorating situation in Lebanon and the shaky status of the Gemayel government

According to well-informed sources, Mr. McFarlane has been concentrating on shoring up the Gemayel government while hoping mate in Lebanon, while at the same not to harden Syria's already adamant opposition to the withdrawal accord. Among other things, Mr. McFarlane has suggested that Israel make public a timetable for the complete withdrawal of its troops from Lebanon.

Such a step, according to the sources, might help Mr. Gemayel convince leaders of Lebanon's various factions that Israel's partial withdrawal is the first stage in a total evacuation and not the beginning of a partition of the country that would leave heavily Moslem southern Lebanon under permanent Israeli occupation and eastern Lebanon under the control of the

The timetable idea, however, has received a cool reception so far from Israeli officials, who argue they have abundantly clear made their intention to leave Lebanon as soon as the Syrians do. Mr. Shamir was quoted Thursday as describing the charge that Israel seeks a partition of Lebanon as "absurd" and that "the whole world knows it."

Israeli officials have said they are willing to do what they can to ease the burdens on the Gemayel government while stressing their deter-mination to "redeploy" their forces in new positions farther south along Lebanon's Awali River.

Wednesday's shelling of the Beirut airport, in which two Israeli soldiers were killed, is likely to harden this resolve. Lawyer Says He Fears for Gelli's Safety GENEVA (Reuters) - The lawyer for Licio Gelli, sought by Italy for complicity in the Banco Ambrosiano collapse, expressed fears Thursday that his client may have been kidnapped and possibly murdered in his disappearance Tuesday night or early Wednesday from a Swiss prison. The attorney, Dominique Poncet, said bloodstains and traces of chloroform found in Mr. Gelli's cell strengthened his fears. But police said they still did not know whether the disappearance was an escape, an abduction or an escape made to look like a kidnapping. In Rome, parliamentary questions about the case delayed a confidence vote on the new, Socialist-led government of Bettino Craxi.

Ex-Chief of EPA Cleared of Charges

WASHINGTON (AP) - The Justice Department on Thursday cleared the former chief of the Environmental Protection Agency, Anne M. Burford, and five of her aides of criminal wrongdoing. A House subcommittee chairman, Representative James H. Scheuer, said the action "carries the aroma

Mr. Scheuer, Democrat-Liberal of New York, called the report a "transparently political document" geared to protecting the adminis-tration's version of EPA controversies rather than "aggressively pur-suing allegations of wrongdoing."

Malta Expected to Hold Out on Pact MADRID (AP) - A British diplomat said Thursday there was little likelihood that Malta would soon add its approval to the Madrid agreement and allow the East-West talks to come to a formal end in time for a foreign ministers' meeting scheduled here in September.

"There is honestly nothing that can happen here at the conference in Madrid with regard to Malta," said Kevin Passmore, first secretary of the British delegation. Reports from Helsinki and Bucharest indicate that the Finns and the Romanians may be trying to convince Prime Minister Dominic Mintoff to change his mind.

Malta is the only one of the 35 nations participating in the Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe that has not approved a final document that seeks to insure the process of human rights observation and monitoring initiated in Helsinki in 1975. Maltese officials say the document should place greater emphasis on issues of Mediterranean security and are calling for a conference on that region's security.

A draft treaty proposed by the United States on July 8 incorporates only the proposed limit of 5,000 on missile warheads. The other numbers have been prescuted orally by Edward L. Rowny, the chief

Officials said the interagency study had been re-quested by Mr. Reagan in June after he announced that he was dropping the demand that the Soviet Union reduce its total number of missiles, as distinguished from the warheads they carry, by two-thirds and the United States by one-third, to an equal ceiling

No new total was given, but U.S. negotiators have add extra warher talked about 1,200. At the same time, they proposed a warhead limits.

ceiling of 1,800 on missiles and bombers, with various subceilings, to be reached by 1990.

According to a number of officials who have seen the new study, it suggests that throw weight has become less important in view of advances in missile accuracy. From this, and based on intelligence regarding Soviet programs, the study concludes that Moscow may in the course of modernizing develop smaller and more accurate missiles.

Officials said the Russians have been testing a small mobile missile with a single warhead and a mediumheavy missile that fit the projected pattern.

The conclusions are expected to be challenged by Pentagon officials, who want to limit throw weight to prevent what they call Soviet "barrage" and "breakout" abilities.

High levels of throw weight would allow Soviet missiles to carry large warheads that could "barrage" or spread over U.S. missile fields and suppress a counterattack. The absence of a limit on throw weight, in the Pentagon view, may also enable the Russians to add extra warheads to missiles and thus "break out" of

U.S. Study Questions Allied Position In Debate on French, British Missiles

By Michael Getler

Weshington Post Service WASHINGTON - A new Library of Congress report has raised questions about a key allied argument in nuclear arms negotiations with the Soviet Union, and it suggests that insistence on excluding British and French missiles may conflict with some basic obligations of those countries.

The dispute between Washington and the Kremlin over whether to include about 162 British and French missiles in the Geneva talks on reducing intermediate-range nuclear forces is widely recognized as a major obstacle in the way of an agreement, as the report by the Congressional Research Service of the Library of Congress pointed

While the Library of Congress report reviews many of the arguments advanced by the West and even adds a few more that are frequently overlooked, it also suggests that some of these arguments appear to contradict formal obligations undertaken by Britian and France in both the basic NATO treaty of 1949 and the subsequent Western European Union agree-

New Foreign Minister Chosen in Guatemala; 3 in Cabinet Retained

GUATEMALA CITY - Guatemala's new military leader. General Oscar Mejia Victores, has dismissed the foreign minister, Eduardo Castillo Artiola, and replaced him with Fernando Andrade, a widely respected lawyer who is expected to be more critical of idicaragua's leftist government.

Government officials said Wednesday that the change was the first in the Guatemalan cabinet since General Mejia Victores came to power in a coup Monday.

Political sources speculated that Mr. Andrade would be sympathetic to General Mejia Victores's views on Nicaragua. The general has said that the Sandinist government is a threat to all of Latin

They noted that Mr. Arriola had refrained from joining Honduras and Costa Rica when they sharply criticized Nicaragua in recent regional peace talks sponsored by the four nations known as the Contadora group — Mexico, Venezuela, Colombia and Panama

The government officials also said three other ministers had been confirmed in the posts they held under General Efrain Rios Montt, who was deposed in the coup. The three are Leonardo Figueroa Vil-

late, the finance minister; Arturo Padilla, the economy minister, and Colonel Leonel Ortega Rivas, the communications minister.

Spokesmen for Guatemala's political right said they wanted a transitional government, backed by the country's major political parties, to prepare for a swift return to constitutional rule.

Mario Sandoval Alarcon, head of the rightist National Liberation Movement, a leading force in Guatemalan politics for two decades. said the subject had been discussed by five rightist parties and the centrist Christian Democratic Party.

"What we want most of all is democratic elections," Mr. Sando-val said Tuesday, "But pending a return to constitutional rule, we would like a government of national unity including representatives of the major parties.

Government officials and diplomats say the right would benefit most from early elections, chiefly because its parties are well organ ised and experienced.

General Mejia Victores has pledged to establish a timetable for elections, but has not yet announced a date for voting. General Rios Montt said last month that elections would be held July 1.

[John R. Hughes, a spokesman for the U.S. State Department, rejected the Soviet protest Thursday, saying the U.S. actions "were in no way provocative or in violation of international law," The Associated Press reported from Washington.]

Reagan administration officials have said that orders remain in force under which U.S. Navy captains off Central American coasts can question Soviet-bloe vessels that they believe may be carrying military equipment. The U.S. position has been that the Alexander Ulyanov was carrying helicopters and other military equipment when it was approached.

As related by U.S. officials several days after the incident, the cap-tain of the USS Lynde McCormick approached the Alexander Ulyanov 55 miles off the Nicaraguan coast and asked by radio for details of its origin, destination and cargo. The Soviet captain was said to have replied that his cargo was general merchandise, and the U.S. vessels made no effort to prevent him from continuing his voyage.

The Reagan administration has contended that Soviet-bloc military equipment has been reaching Nicasince 1981, with shipments concentrating on heavy equipment such as tanks, artillery and aircraft. William P. Horn, deputy undersecretary of the interior, said Wednesday that the land swap "constitutes a net benefit to the refuge system," since temporary leasing of St. Matthew has given the department permanent title to three times its acreage in wilderness

But the environmentalists said that St. Matthew Island is more valuable wilderness than the lands being acquired and that oil spills and the roar of jets are certain to ruin it as a nesting habitat. They also argued that the 14,000 acres being acquired are already suffi-ciently protected as wilderness.

Ready, Aim, Negotiate

If you are confused about the Reagan administration's approach to Central America, the news of the last two weeks is excuse enough. What was billed as strictly routine sending battle fleets and staging massive manerivers - is now said to have been calculated. peaceful therapy. And, Secretary of State Shultz says, "It is showing results."

So be it. If the administration wants to turn a cheek, that is all to the good. President Reagan all too recently scorned negotiation with the region's revolutionaries. Cheekily, he now calls it a positive sign that his special envoy met Salvadoran and Nicaraguan leftists.

What will "work" to the U.S. advantage in Central America are arrangements that advance peaceful political evolution and respect for every country's independence. Neither objective justifies the forcible overthrow of Nicaragua's leftist regime or abetting the almost random killing in El Salvador. What will open the way for negotiations is not a Soviet-U.S. propaganda contest at sea but a more careful use of U.S. power and influence to end El Salvador's civil war and to promote democracy in Nicaragua by peaceful means. If it is diplomacy Mr. Reagan wants, he may have his opening. A plainly baffled Fidel Castro now talks of pulling his advisers out of Nicaragua if the United States reciprocates in El Salvador. The Sandinist rulers of Nicaragna endorse the idea and talk of a regional deal to end all arms shipments to El Salvador.

That is broadly the course urged by the patient Contadora mediators from Mexico, Venezuela, Colombia and Panama. Rhetorically, at least, peace is in the air.

It could be bot air - but, assuming a modicum of good faith, what next?

A sensible step is to let Richard Stone, the presidential envoy, seek a basis for a deal in El Salvador, looking toward a supervised armis-tice and eventual elections. Making Cuba a party to the discussion, as urged by the Senate majority leader, Howard Baker, could help.

On the face of it, the agendas of the govern-ment and insurgents in El Salvador are incompatible. The government offers to discuss only the left's participation in elections; the left first wants some power in the interim regime that prepares the vote. But both sides should be sick of the wild killing, which has not much advanced anyone's cause. A military standoff can be a powerful incentive for compromise. Mr. Reagan's ability to intervene or to help the government achieve "victory" is obviously limited. But the aid furnished so far has surely reduced the insurgents' expectations, too.

When Mr. Stone finally obtained a meeting with a Salvadoran leftist leader, it was in Bogota, with Colombia's President Betancur, a conservative, as the go-between. Mr. Stone doubtless found that this rebel. Ruben Zamora, is a disenchanted democrat, not a rabid revolutionary. The guarantees for pluralism that the United States seeks may be important to Mr. Zamora. Repairing relations among such leaders should have a high priority.

Negotiations, by definition, require compromises. Mr. Reagan has come perilously close to widening conflicts that he should want to contain. Central America's leftists have come dangerously close to forgetting their vulnerability. If the shared benefits of a settlement are mutually understood, it may now be possible to stop the killing and discuss the future in a new tone of voice.

- THE NEW YORK TIMES.

A Costly Compliment

rest of the world is currently paying to the United States, but an expensive and inconvenient compliment. As the dollar rises against other major currencies, the prices of American exports rise abroad and foreign imports become more competitive than ever.

Governments say they are intervening in the market, selling dollars to restrain the dollar's rise and buying other currencies to bid them up. That kind of operation is useful to damp down fluctuations in the rates and to make the speculators' games a little more risky for them, but it won't have much effect on the basic alignments of the currencies.

There was a time when governments could hold rates pretty much where they pleased, but those days are gone forever. Money now moves across borders in such volumes and with such speed that no government has the resources to offset it. The rates are being set by much deeper forces. One of them is the impression, widespread around the world, that the United States is a safer place than most to park money. Another is the forecast of a promising recovery of the American economy. After a year of repeated debt and currency crises in Latin America and predictions of weak growth and rising unemployment in Europe, a lot of people have been moving their wealth to the United States. That tends to pash the dollar up, and there is not much that the United States can —or ought to try — to do about it. But the strong dollar has other causes, which ought to be of real concern to Americans. They arise from the federal government's gigantic budget deficit. The most recent rise in the dollar's international value is apparently related to the very large borrowing operations that the Treasury has been conducting as it pro-ceeds to finance the rapidly rising debt. The deficit is pushing up interest rates, and the interest rates attract funds from abroad. Foreigners sell their own national currencies and buy dollars. That bids up the price of the dollar in the continuous auctions that go on in the trading rooms of the big international banks. It would be nice to think that someone in the government might somehow, by pulling invisiole wires, manipulate the market and force those interest and exchange rates down silently and painlessly. Unfortunately that is not possible. Intervention isn't capable of it. The only remedy likely to make much difference is reducing the delicit. Until that happens, interest and exchange rates will continue to cast a shadow over the recovery of the economy.

Other Opinion

De Facto Industrial Policies

America's industrial policy is not rooted in a general governmental economic approach, un-like its traditional fiscal and monetary pol-icy. Nevertheless, in practice there are governmen tal measures that constitute a de facto industrial policy, although the pretext for their existence is given as national security, development of high technology, amelioration of the unemployment problem or import relief. Similarly, although West Germany has in principle adopted a market economy, it maintains an industrial policy under the guise of regional or social policies.

A Salvadoran Front Line

Both President Reagan and his critics need to stand back and look at what the United States is trying to achieve in Central America. The aim is to prevent the replacement of brutal right-wing regimes, which the United States had tolerated far too long, by equally brutal

The front line is El Salvador, not because it is yet a country where the rule of law and nan rights mean much (although far-right savagery is slowly being tarned) but because, as last year's election showed, at least twothirds of its people object to being "liberated" by the revolutionary left.

If, but only if, President Reagan concluded that the Salvadorans had lost the stomach and the means to fight, would be be right to aban-don the country and make a stand on the next defensible hill. Democratic but feeble Honduras is an easy target for guerrilla penetration. Guatemala's bloodthirsty soldiers make that country a hard place to fall back on. That leaves Mexico's southern border and Costa Rica's northern border as the alternative places to make a stand. Better, surely, to hold the line at El Salvador.

- The Economist (London). Just as a string of military successes against Marxist guerillas transformed the mood in San Salvador, the appearance of Henry A. Kissinger on the Central American stage revived fears that El Salvador might be sacrificed to a U.S.-Soviet accommodation.

Salvadoran officials have become much too astute to express publicly anything less than satisfaction that so eminent a statesman is concerning himself with banana republics. But in private they raise concerns about juxtaposi-tion of the U.S. naval display with the Kissin-ger commission. "We are afraid Dr. Kissinger will talk President Reagan into making the trade," a Salvadoran official told us. That long-feared "trade" amounts to taking the pressure off Nicaragua's Marxist regime in return for keeping hands off El Salvador. But in San Salvador, if not in Washington, it is an ineradicable fact that no Central American nation can be secure while a Sandinist regime calls for "revolution without borders."

American public opinion regards Japan as America's rival, hence a powerful navy must be constructed against the Rising Sun; but I doubt this policy against Japan will continue, since the American government follows public opinion, which is likely to change with better light on the real attitude of Japan. America Should View Japan as Equal

N EW YORK — Monday will bring the 38th anniversary of Japan's unconditional surrender to the Allies. Almost four decades have elapsed, yet there is continued American reluctance to treat Japan as a mature equal.

For the first time since World War II Japan has a prime minister who has publicly said that true independence is impossible as long as Japan depends on the United States for its territorial security. Yasuhiro Nakasone has also said that the Japanese constitution must eventually be revised because it leaves room for doubt about Japan's possession of its own defense forces.

Mr. Nakasone is clearly paving the way for the emergence of a more independent — although still friendly — Japan. Yet many Americans in and out of government cling to the notion that Japan's security should continue to be guaranteed by the United States under the one-sided Japan-United States Security Treaty of 1960. which is viewed by many as the cornerstone of a semi-perpetual, bilateral "alliance." At the same time they berate Japan for failing to increase its defense spending enough to achieve an effective and independent conventional defense.

America cannot have it both ways. If it wants Japan to rearm and be able to defend itself, it must stop asserting a need to preserve the relationship in its present lopsided form. The 1960 treaty is obsolete. Japan stands on the threshold of a new era, with the past four decades serving as a transition from defeat to real independence, including full responsibility for defense.

gically, if not economically — to assume responsibility for their defense.

The establishment in Japan of an Alliance for the Promotion of an Independent Constitution and the firm commitment to constitutional revision by the governing Liberal Democratic Party are symbolic of this new attitude.

of the western Pacific. Speaking in New York in May, Prime Minister Nakasone said: "I harbor the dream that the United States, the ASEAN countries, Australia, New Zealand, Canada and all of the other countries bordering on the Pacific Ocean can come together to create a new economic and cultural sphere in the 21st century."

Such a community could ease America's burden of defending Japan and the western Pacific, without giving rise to justifiable concern about a resurgence of Japanese militarism. The warm reception accorded Mr. Nakasone during his recent visit to Southeast Asia belies the view that Japanese militarism is viewed by Japan's former Asian enemies as a realistic threat.

The Japanese-U.S. treaty can no longer be defended as necessary for restraining long-abandoned Japanese ambitions in Asia. In any event, Japan is not a probationer, and America is not its probation officer. Countries, like individuals, need space. It is time the United States stopped pressuring Japan on defense and let it chart a more independent course. Americans might then be surprised to find a Japan willing to shoulder its defense burdens and to participate fully in the global political and economic order in a manner consistent with American interests and with Japan's emerging status as a historically independent, highly civilized and mature industrial power.

Given these conditions, U.S. policy

The Nub Of Botha's Problem

By Colin Legum

▼ ONDON — The problems facing & L reformist prime ministers in South Africa are immense, and have defeated stronger leaders than P.W. Botha, Jan Smuts and his ablest lientenant, Jan Joimeyr, were ruthlessly discarded in the 1940s when their policies were seen by the white electorate as too liberal because they were speaking of, although not yet acting on, the need to get away from a segregated society.

A different stripe of politician: Hendrik Verwoerd, was blocked when he tried to reform the country by engaging in full-blooded apartheid in the late 1950s and early 60s, because the electorate, as represented by the National Party's all-powerful parliamentary caucus, refused to accept the economic costs involved in carrying out the Tombinson Commission's recommendations to give some semblance of viability to Bantustans. Mr. Botha's immediate predecessor, John Vorster, was discouraged from carrying out reforms when, after the collapse of Portuguese co-lonialism in 1974, he understood that without change the republic faced a future "too ghastly to contemplate." In September 1978 Mr. Botha became the first prime minister to make a serious attempt to change the status quo, albeit along lines that would preserve white power. Serious doubts have now begun to develop whether. if he pursues even his limited ideas of reform, he can survive By taking the risk in February 1981 of splitting Afrikaner unity, he spawned a new force on his right that threatens, if not to bring him down, at least to block him from going as far or as fast as he would like along his chosen path of reform.

The dilemma facing Mr. Botha is the same as the one confronted by the more redoubtable Smuts, Hofmeyr and Vorster. They understood the need for reform but failed to persuade the bulk of the white electorate. Those who stood to gain from real 🗷 reform - the black majority - were voteless, and so could not be rallied to underpin the prime minister's position in Parliament.

The leader of the opposition, Dr.

F. van Zyl Slabbert, has put it this way: "A white politician spends most of his time during an election asking whites to vote for him so that he can go to Parliament and spend most of his time talking about what to do about blacks, who cannot vote for him in any case."

Mr. Botha has been cleverer than his predecessors in his manipulative political skills. He has been helped by evidence of growing black power and of the failure of the apartheid system gan's peace plan has underscored the Israeli argument that many Arabs to achieve its aims. The system can survive only by making compromises — yielding to reforms where they are absolutely greater urgency to the question of the West Bank than do the leaders of necessary, as by recognizing black trade unions and acknowledging that urban blacks are a permanent feature of South African society. But there is still a failure to produce an alternative political system to apartheid. Mr. Botha's government by manipulation is essentially a transitional approach — but a transition to what? It is not that he is less aware of the. crucial nature of South Africa's problems than are his critics. But to succeed he must educate fellow whites to go in a direction most of them fear. And here is the nub of the South African predicament: To awaken whites to the risks they face if they don't adapt, the prime minister must emphasize the dangers, but to do so is to strengthen the very fears that in-cline voters toward the old hard line of white supremacy. In a typical speech, Mr. Botha has a asked: "If we as nationalists and Afrikaners were today in the position where we had no franchise in our own areas - neither on the national, nor. It is impossible to predict how long this warmth between Israel and the United States will last. For now, at areas — neither on the national, nor provincial nor parliamentary level — would we be satisfied with that?"

Referring to the Afrikaners' cherished belief that they are God's chosen people in Africa, he has declared: "I must accept one thing. The God I believe in is big enough to be the God of others as well."

And: "Must we just accept to people." And: "Must we just aspire to peace

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

Armenians in the News

In reporting Armenian terrorist acts, you invariably repeat the Armenian accusations against Turks. You do not, as a rule, tell your readers what motivates Irish terrorists, for example.

Do you not realize that the primary objective of Armenian terrorists is to get the press to publicize their allegations? The terrorists know they have access to free publicity every time they shed blood.

Industrial Policies Regarding the editorial "Industrial

Policies" (IHT, June 30): I should like to congratulate you very warmly for the content and spirit of your leading editorial on a theme which I would call "ideology and mutual understanding."

As an economist working in the field of structural adjustment and trade policy — until the end of last

June as a member of the GATT secre- has never promulgated a strategy for tariat - I firmly believe that whatever the manifold economic shortcomings of the industrial policies pursued in Japan, France and other European countries, the ability of all countries, including the most powerful ones, to adapt to new chall and to negotiate internationally implies first of all an endeavor to understand practices and policies existing elsewhere that are based on different national values and cultures. NICOLAS MARIAN, University of Geneva.

Building Democracy

Regarding "Brinkmanship is Fine - When it Works" (IHT, Aug. 3):

Ernest Conine approvingly quotes a study asserting, "Discreet uses of armed forces are often an effective way of achieving near-term foreign policy objectives." The problem with U.S. policy in Central America lies not so much in the potential failure of brinkmanship in the short-term as in the absence of a clear long-term foreign policy strategy.

While voicing empty demands for "democracy and human rights" in the region, the Reagan administration achieving such ends, short of the short-term "solution" of military pressure. It is the lack of a long-term strategy that proves so clearly upsetting to so many people.

The belief that democracy can be established overnight, be it through negotiations or military pressure, is clearly faise. That elections are held' is not in and of itself proof that democracy prevails, nor that subsequent elections and alternation in go-

needs the consent of the governed and a political culture. These fundamental ingredients of democratic nation-building should not be ignored

"I was surprised that she never received the Nobel Prize," said Paul A. Samuelson of the Massa-chusetts Institute of Technology. who did win the award and whose ideas Mrs. Robinson contested. "She has been a very contentious Mr. Bob figure, but also a very important figure."

From the earliest days of her career, Mrs. Robinson developed a reputation for questioning the direction professional economics was taking. In 1933, for example, she published "Economics of Imperfect Competition," which said that economies did not consist of the perfectly competitive markets that are so often assumed in economic theory, and which offered alterna-

NEW YORK — A judge has turned down a request by Marc Rich & Co. International Ltd., a commodity trading firm, for 12 more days to produce subpoenaed documents.

Marc Rich has spent the last year and a half reasting requests for the documents, which had been subpoensed by a federal grand jury investigating possible tax evasion by Marc Rich & Company A.G., which was the parent firm of March Rich International.

In a court hearing Wednesday, Judge Leon-ard B. Sand, who was visibily irritated, ordered Marc Rich International to turn over all requested documents in the United States by the close of business Wednesday.

And he gave the firm until Monday morning to produce any remaining documents under subpoena. Most of the other documents are in Zug, Switzerland, where Marc Rich International had been based before it was sold and renamed Clarendon Ltd., itself now based in Zug. Zug.

Prosecutors and defense lawyers spent more than an hour Wednesday fighting over how long government began subpoening the papers in March 1982 as part of its investigation into whether Marc Rich A.G. had used an oil pricing scheme to reduce its 1981 U.S. income taxes. scheme to reduce its 1981 U.S. income taxes. In making his order to produce some documents by the end of business Wednesday, Judge Sand in effect gave Clarendon a one-day extension. The judge had originally said that documents in the United States had to be in prosecutors' hands by Tuesday. He ordered that deadline after U.S. agents, acting on a late-night tip Monday, halted a jet at John F. Kennedy International Airport and seized two steamer trunks crammed with documents that they said came under the subposena.

trunks crammed with documents that they said came under the subpoena.

At Wednesday's hearing, lawyers for Clarendon told the judge that they had been unable to meet his Tuesday deadline because its clerical staff simply did not have enough time to duplicate the papers. The lawyers asked to deliver all papers, in and outside the United States, by Aug. 22.

Judge Sand, however, angered by what he considered delaying tactics, refused the requests.

pop grocery store," Judge Sand said. "We are dealing here with a worldwide commodity-trading firm, which, I have been told, uses telezes, telephones — in short, all the devices of modern communication."

Clarendon lawyers had until 9:30 a.m.

Wednesday to review documents in the heavy, black steamer trunks seized at the airport. But the lawyers permitted the deadline to pass, and the trunks were placed in the custody of the prosecutors.

According to Jane W. Parver, an assistant U.S. attorney in charge of the Major Crimes unit, the documents in the trunks, which were sealed after being taken from the plane, will be given to the grand jury investigating Marc Rich A.G.

Leni Riefenstahl and one of her photographs of the Nuba.

Triumph of a Will

by Joseph Fitchett

UNICH --- At age 81 and seeking vindication, Leni Riefen-stabl is finally writing her memoirs, giving her version of how the documentary films she made in Nazi Ger-many turned her first into the world's leading woman film director and then after World War II into an artistic pariah — and how she regained an audience as a still photographer. "For years, they wanted the memoirs, but I couldn't, it was too painful," she says. "I didn't want to write if I had to suffer too much to be free writing it."

Originally a movie actress, she directed her first movie in 1932. "Blue Light" is the story of an exceptional woman who is mysteriously guided up a previously unconquered mountain and who is killed by villagers jealous of her unique gift ("It was the story of me," Riefenstahl says now). The success of this film brought her an order from Hitler to make Triumph of the Will," a hypnotic evocation of a Nazi rally soon after he came to power, and, above all, "Olympia," a four-hour celebration of the Berlin Olympic Games in 1936.

She was acclaimed for her artistic success but, critics said after the war, this could not justify works that provided propaganda sup-port for the Nazis. Riefenstahl was never able to make another movie. Gradually, however, she was able to work again (initially using her former husband's name, Jacobs), this time as a photographer. Her images of primitive African tribespeople, capturing a culture just before it disappeared, gained worldwide attention when her book "The Last of the Nuba," was pub-

The revival of her career - inevitably accompanied by renewed controversy about her Nazi background and sensual, violent subject matter - has now driven Riefenstahl to tell her own story. To convince future generations, she wants to recreate her life as she felt it, dramatizing her passion for creation, which, she says, blinded her to the politics of her patron, Hitler.

Bridling at suggestions that she worships a cult of physical beauty, she says her autobiography is intended to explain the aesthetic approach in her work.

This need to justify herself has gradually taken precedence over all her other projects: photography, unfinished films, planned books.

Now I could do things I was prevented from doing for 20 years, but I've stopped everything for the memoirs," she explained in an interview at her home - a casual, functional house in a lakeside village outside Munich.

She has given up on help from ghostwriters. Four of them were tried, but they were "too far from what I feel," she says in her accented, pungent English. "Now I do it with my own hand." It is delicate surgery, laying bare the veins of experience beneath the scar-tissue of polemic. She writes with only an assistant, Wera Bauer, an admiring young woman who lives nearby and comes daily to the pinesurrounded house. The only other regular visitor is her longtime cameraman, Horst Kettner,

Both women work looking out into the woods, seated at a long white desk with tape recorders, electric typewriters and boxes of files containing correspondence, clippings and court judgments from the stream of lawsuits she has filed, and won, over what she says are slanderous exaggerations about her Nazi links.

Daily, she dictates her recollections of one of this century's longest artistic careers, beginning as a film star in mountain-climbing ro-mances, a popular genre in Germany in the 1920s. Her assistant types each episode, then helps her go over it line by line, weighing each word, testing synonyms that might recapture the moment more vividly.

"She starts early every morning," Bauer explains, "except occasionally when she has had a painful night." In a skiing accident three years ago, Riefenstahl broke her hip badly (a similar fracture in childhood cut short her first artistic ambitions as a dancer). But a plastic hip has not ended her scuba-diving expeditions to the Caribbean and the Indian Ocean, in pursuit of her latest artistic passion, underwater photography, which she took up at 70.

Looking decades younger than her age, she makes an entrance down her home's open stairs, wearing high heels despite her fragile hip. A simple cream dress and rope of pearls sets off her hair, now blonde, although she was brunette in films. She has the kind of imperishable beauty that, even her critic Susan Sontag concedes, "only gets gayer, more metallic and healthier-looking with age." In her smile, there is a flash of the engaging, confident young beauty who conquered mountains and men, knew it and loved it.

In her new, serene mood, she has agreed to reissue the rare volume published with "Olympia," a book of ravishing black-and-white stills from the film, including some of the first nudes in movies. "Let people see for themselves that it is about sport and not a kind of pro-German hymn," she says, "that it seeks a kind of abstract beauty by putting bodies against the sky instead of an ordinary background, yes, that it is most of all about beauty."

Her conception of beauty is offended by the work of postwar West German filmmakers. "The new generation of Germans can't make art because they are airaid. It's a kind of sickness," she says. "They can't be proud, and they are not comfortable with beauty. It's fantastic, no? We all want to be beautiful, it's normal so."

Her aesthetic passion - until the memoirs interrupted other activities - focuses on an extraordinary form of underwater photography she discovered through Douglas Faulkner, an American photographer, who has become a friend. "He's crazy, but a good artist is always crazy, at least in most people's eyes," she explains, "and I've always been drawn to exceptional people.

introduced by Faulkner to ocean reefs around the world, she discovered myriad tiny marine animals that appear dull to the unaided eye but, under special lighting and with filters, become brilliant objects, resembling psychedelic plants or baroque jewelry,

"To get this, you must be a photographer, not just a diver with a camera," she says, as the slides are being shown. "You must have pas-

The images - each a kind of abstract painting - flow into one another with the compelling continuity of her early films. In the darkness, watching the slides, Riefenstahl seems to loosen up and move slightly away from the set responses that she has given in countless inter-

The uncompleted project she regrets most, she says, was a planned film on Penthesilea, the Amazon heroine of Heinrich von Kleist whose tragic mixture of male pride and female pasfascinates Riefenstahl.

"I never felt any different from men," she says. "But sometimes men were lealons of my success, especially because I was a woman." A feminist in practice and a half-acknowledged heroine of the women's movement, she shunned the cause because, she says, only exceptional individuals interest her. She does not want to elaborate on this subject or on politics. "My problem is time," she insists, gesturing to a shelf of film cans. "I've

The signs were clear: Bergh was going to set up business, and so he has. Using New York and Chicago distribu-tors, he will start publishing under the Bergh Westchester Press, Inc. imprint in 1984. The titles remain secret for the moment, but he lans to publish up to 10 books a year, starting off with European and African authors. Print runs will be small. "I think the States now has room for so-called small books, Bergh said while passing through London on his way to New York. "I have a certain advan-tage over my American colleagues since I can read non-English-language books myself." He is fluent in most European languages and, being multilingual, can rely solely on his own

"The difficulty for an American publisher is that he has to rely on a reader's report, which will tell him about the literary merits of the iscript but not about the sales possibilities. If you have to rely on reader and critics, you can end up publishing a dead duck."

Bergh's live ducks have ranged from Thornton Wilder to V.S. Naipaul, from C.G. Jung to Ernest K. Gann, a popular novelist. He has just bought the Swedish rights to Juliette Greco's autobiography, and in September Ediciones Sven Erik Bergh of Malaga will publish a book by Mercedes Salisachs on Pablo Casals.

Recipe for a Publishing House

Burly and energetic at 71, Bergh was educated in Berlin, where his Swedish father was a shipowner, and took an M.A. in Persian and pany, in Malmö, Sweden, employs only four Arabic at Worcester College, Oxford, Then he was sent home to Uppsala. "Having been to Berlin and Oxford, Uppsala was so boring. I thought I would wait for a miracle and it came." The miracle was to be asked back to Berlin to help out a Jewish-owned publishing house that Goebbels was planning to turn into propaganda machine.

Bergh joined a big Swedish publisher, Esselte, for a crash course in the trade and came up with such ideas, heretical then in Sweden, as holding cocktail parties to launch a book.

Two days before he was to leave on a trip to America, the Germans occupied Denmark and Norway. He stayed on in Sweden, and the first book he produced on his own was "Defeats and Victories on the European Battlefield from the Persians to the Finnish Winter War.

"It was the first book saying we could win the war. From the time of the ancient Greeks it proved that it was not the size of the army that was important, but the morale." The book was a propaganda attempt to arouse Sweden. "It was to counter defeatism. After all, we could have done something." The first printing was 10,000; within months 45,000 copies were sold.

Sweden remained neutral but Bergh was azing beyond his own frontiers. The Germans had prevented the sale and publication in occupied Europe of English-language books as well as books by blacklisted authors. Bergh went to see diplomats at the British and American embassies in Stockholm and got in touch with British publishers. A network was quickly set up whereby one copy each of books chosen by the British publisher and printed on bible paper were delivered to Bergh's Swedish publishing house by diplomatic pouch. They were then reproduced by offset and exported in sealed wagons as neutral Swedish property to Switzerland. From there they were distributed to the remainder of free Europe and smuggled into the occupied countries.

by Mercedes Salisachs on Pablo Casals.

"I will publish a book on UFOs or a novel on ancient Egypt or Nietzsche's poems," Bergh made his first wartime trip to London in 1942, when there was still one flight from Stockholm per week: "The Londoners were so cool that the porter at the Hyde Park Hotel had misplaced the key to the bomb shelter." he

In London, Bergh astonished British publishers by offering them a credit in advance of sales of 150,000 Swedish kronor until they had won the war. At the time Rommel was advancing on Cairo and victory did not seem exactly around the corner. "If the Allies had lost the war, the Swedish crown wouldn't have bought anything anyway," Bergh says with a shrug. His books, which ranged from classics to such novelues as "How Green Was My Valley," circulated from Norway to Romania. When war ended, three trainloads of books in German were ready to be delivered free to the Germans, fulfilling Bergh's hope that "when armistice was declared, books would follow on the heels of soldiers."

Bergh's action was partly pragmatic — "after all, Sweden had the paper, England had the titles" -and partly an act of high idealism. His psychological boost to the British of offering them a large credit got him in trouble with Dag Hammerskjöld, later Secretary General of the United Nations, who pointed out that the transaction had not been approved by the Swedish Foreign Exchange Board.

"Hammerskjöld was very much a civil servant," Bergh says. Unwisely forgetting this experience, Bergh went to work for the United Nations in New York in 1947. "It was typical. They put me in charge of all contracts except in the field I know, publishing. I was in charge of contracts for window cleaning, elevators, things like that." In 1954 he returned to Sweden and to publishing.

In his youth Bergh was a marathon runner. and a statue of him made in 1939 by the Swiss sculptor Alexander Zschokke still stands in the stadium at Basel. "He kept feeding me Easter eggs during the sculpting to keep me still. At the end, I wouldn't have been able to run if I'd wanted to."

Although he is embarking on a new publishing venture in America at an age when be might be happily retired, Bergh really believes he is cutting down. "At least I am trying to," he said. "Everyone in my office is getting older and I have too many books."

Feeding the French in London

by John Vinocur

ONDON - The French go arrogantly to Spain, hardly to Germany, and with a trace of trepidation to England. If maps were Rorschach tests, the Gallic brain, fixing on Spain, would probably respond: noise-cheap-hot. Germany gets treated, personally if not politically, rather like Saul Steinberg's notion of what ies west of the Hudson River. A Parisian woman who was asked at dinner a while ago if she had ever been there replied, "Why?"
But England, the English, London, make the French nervous. The place is self-possessed, the people not easily dazzled. No amount of posing or feigned superiority move it, and the French, who often expect the world to shield its eyes from their brilliance, are thrown off in advance, knowing that the English won't blink. Since the French are basically most comfortable at embracing countries they think they have discovered, or where they suppose they are greatly admired, another epproach is required.

What the French (about 1.6 million of them last year) do about visiting England is to protect themselves. Mostly, they overbid: the shabby becomes the sublime. Feeling insecure, the French on their own in London don't mock, but swoon. A hotel carpet worn woofless is a marvel; a pair of heather-green knee-socks becomes an article of transcendent chic. Everything is original. With absolute determination, local standoffishness gets translated into reserve; laziness is explained way as an aristocratic sense of pace.

Master needlers and brilliant complainers most of the time, the French drop their elegant contempt in London simply because it serves no purpose. This is the opposite of reflex for many of them, and they are fascinating in this role reversal: a bit timid, exaggeratedly polite and patient, even shy. But the French must eat, even in this altered state, and there the transformation ends.

I'm rather more interested in being around the French at lower levels of beatitude and, spending a weekend in London a while back in proximity of a French couple, felt pretty relieved when food came up. My friends stopped working so hard at being so charmed, and their critical senses slowly returned to them; in no time at all, all the nervousness about being nice for an extended period was gone, replaced by a mood of strained tolerance, authentically French.

They had spent the morning hunting for bath oils at Floris on Jermyn Street, inspecting stationery at Smythson on New Bond Street, and buying shoes. The man at Church's told us that while the French always eemed to prefer a tight fit, the Americans loved loose loafers. Suddenly, in a mood of gathering tension, it was lunch time. The French have been told again and again that restaurants in London have vastly improved, but in their hearts they don't believe it. You can't eat quaint.

The following preparations had been made: a copy of Henri Gault and Christian Millau's "Le Guide de Londres" was purchased, and telephone calls placed not only to Gault, a leading Paris food critic, but to a few London Frenchmen like Pierre Martin, owner of Le Suquet, a pretty solid French restaurant on Draycott Avenue, and Bernard Rapp, one of the French television correspondents. Like de Gaulle speaking from exile to the nation on the BBC deep in World War II — "Ici Londres. La France parle aux Français" — they offered theory and "chez," said Bernard Rapp. You could try Tante Claire or Ma Cuisine (it has changed ownership since), added Pierre Martin.

Henri Gault was positively frightening. He said that, in terms of a ratio between population and quality, London was the least interesting city for food in the Western world. The English, he thinks, really don't find it distinguished to eat, although he conceded their restaurants were often decorated better than those in France. But some of the ambitiously decorated ones are more effete theater than food, he warned. My friends shuddered. In the end, Messrs. Gault, Rapp, and Martin sounded a bit alike in their recommendations. Go to ethnic restaurants, they said. Or risk a shot at the couple of meritorious English places.

On our first try, we did as told. Gault recommended Memories of China. But we took Martin's short list and picked the Mayflower Chinese restaurant in Soho over Greek food at the Village Taverna. The Mayflower was a bit of an experience. If the French believe that a Chinese place is really worthwhile, they tend to tell the waiter to make up a menu. They also like to drink beer with Chinese food. This restaurant had no beer, and when the waiter was asked to propose a full meal, he said, distinctly, "I don't do that kind of work. This is a real Chinese restaurant."

For my friends, this was comic insolence out of a Peter Sellers movie a moment of relief from London's unfailing courtesy, and it helped their appenie. We had corn and shrimp soup, rather peppery but very fresh steamed chicken that was quite light and not a trace soggy, and a plate of vegetables and beef. It was a nice meal, my friends said, and it cost about £8 ($12) a person, probably a bit less than something similar in Paris. From there, we dove in the other direction, toward England I had already been to Carrier's, about which Henri Gault writes kindly, and found it precious, the food quelconque. To my amazement, Martin told our canvasser he thinks well of Langan's Brasserie, which is desperately fashionable, but whose cooking reminds me a little of La Coupole in

and an Objection to Its Way

ARIS — After lingering behind the scenes for some 35 years, Leni Riefenstahl during the last decade has stepped forward to face a new public

With what some characterize as a masterful manipulation of the media and others as an astute grasp of a mass public's pleasures, the former filmmaker has focused public attention on her photographic work with three books and three picture essays published between 1973 to 1978.

Her pictures often concentrate on the forms and shapes of people, but so worshipfully does her camera rest on their forms that her subjects are made to appear lifeless. It is difficult to think of her work as serious, unconnected as it is to the important photography coming out of West Germany today.

The first of her recent books, "Die Nuba" (published in 1973 in Munich, and in 1974 in New York as "Last of the Nuba"), contains richly colored pictures that play up the decorative features of the Nuba tribespeople of the Sudan. It was followed by a larger, grander version, called "People of the Kan," published in Munich and New York in 1976. By 1978, with the publication of her third book, "Coral Gardens," in four cities at the same time — Munich, Paris, London and New York — it was clear that she had established an audience after a three-generation histus.

Riefenstahl's pictures are jazzed-up formal conceptions. They play on deep colors that are richly balanced to propel the viewer's eye over a picture's surface, with the help of such standard camera devices as blow-up and pattern.

Many of her photos come close to being portraits, the kind of portraits made popular by Arnold Newman in the 1970s, which frame people in their working environments. Newman's subjects often do come more fully alive, but Riefenstahl's blowups tend to bury the figure in the setting. It is often difficult to identify a person as such.

Other Riefenstahl photographs sweep over terrain, trees and grass to create vast new panoramas. Many look as if they were seen through a movie camera. As in the portraits, Riefenstahl makes vivid use of space, color and shape: reds, grays, greens, browns and white excitingly lock into each other. Patterns play against solids. Light offers contrast.

At first glance, the figures in these portraits are magnetic, drawing viewers into the picture; Riefenstahl has a sense of drama. But as soon as the viewer reacts, the figures become strange. They no longer seem real. Riefenstahl has used light, color and form to turn people

When she photographs a ritual occasion in which tribal members cover themselves with a gray paintlike substance, her camera so magnifies the bodies that they look as if they were molded out of clay. The longer the viewer stays with a picture, the more phantasmagorical it becomes. A person — seen only as a gray form — echoes the shape of a gray rock, looks inanimate. In Oxford, Food for Thought

by Lois Dwan

XFORD, England - To anyone who has searched helplessly through culinary works for even so small a fact as a correct spelling, the possibility of scholastic order in the world of food is bliss. Champious of that cause are Alan Davidson, a former British diplomat who runs Prospect Books, a London-based culinary press, and Theodore Zeldin, fellow of St. Anthony's College in Oxford. Hence the recent Symposium on Food, arranged every 18 months, that gathered on the premise that food is an art deserv ing the same scholarly attention as any other. More than 125 students serious about food and its honorable preparation enrolled for the symposium at St. Anthony's. Most were from England, but there were impressive numbers from Australia, the Netherlands, France, Belgium and all parts of the United States. None

the going was decidedly heavy.

The topic was "Food in Motion: The Migration of Foodstuffs and Cookery Techniques." So vast a subject, said Davidson, that "our optimism resembles that of an aviator [trying] to light the Sahara desert by dropping 20 flares." The papers accepted were printed and bound, then discussed in small groups. As most of the overseas participants had not had the opportunity to read this formidable volume before the discussions, there was a certain lack of focus. The symposium's value lay in the more disciplined research of the printed material, and in the mere fact that such a study was undertaken.

was inclined to treat the subject lightly; indeed,

The coverage ranged from Charles Perry's etymological inquiry into the grain foods of the early Turks (from the 10th century) to Raymond Sokolov's examination of the "mishmash of eclecticism" comprising the "so-called new American enisine." Conquest and occupation are obviously important factors in the traveling of food and cooking techniques. But several papers touched on the curious reluctance of peoples to eat anything to which they are not accustomed. thus creating the reverse phenomenon — the migration of old foods and methods to new

There was much about corn and potatoes, which, with tomatoes, were the great gifts of the New World to the Old. Chuno and tunta. the end products of Inca methods of preserving potatoes by freezing and pressing, were discussed - as were the medlar, spices, the Cornish pasty in Northern Michigan, siesses and saueres (sweets and sours) in Pennsylvania, the migration of Chinese noodles to the Philippines and more.

The Pilgrims were fatally slow to accept the ash, corn and beans of the American Indians, not to mention the unfamiliar game and fish, preferring to wait for their accustomed fare to arrive on the uncertain supply ships and to starve with food all around them. As Alice Ross of New York wrote: "The first settlers in Virginia and Plymouth came unprepared to survive, and most did not. They learned to depend on Indians for corn, and then lessons in how to grow and prepare it; still they suffered decimation from starvation."

In Australia, the early settlers, who arrived in 1788, refused to have anything at all to do with the aborigines or their food, ignoring the fish, vegetables and fruit available and continuing to live on a working-class English diet of flour, rice, salted meat, dried peas and butter.

Their lack of experimentation, as Lionel Stone, an Australian food writer, put it, contributed to the fact that "ours is the only continent which has failed to make any contribution to the range of culinary materials except the macadamia nut, for which the world must be grateful to Hawaiian enterprise."

When the potato failed the Irish in the 1840s. they were equally helpless. "The potato was one of the great gifts of the New World to the Old," wrote Jillian Strang and Joyce Toomre of Massachusetts. "Nutritious and easy to cultivate, it provided the basis for the great population explosion in Europe between 1750 and 1850. They were desperately poor in Ireland, living in one-room cabins without windows. Potatoes were simply boiled in a pot. ... Any superfluities had long since vanished. All that was left was the potato, and by 1846 that was gone too."

The irony was that the seas around were filled with fish, inefficiently caught, scorned as food, used only as fertilizer. "Gold to reap copper," said the great chef of the Reform Club, Alexis Soyer, who had ridden to the (temporary) rescue with soup kitchens and, eventually, a cookbook, "Charitable Cookery, or, The Poor Man's Regenerator." It emphasized the use of available foods in soups, and the emergency import of maize, which the Irish despised. Soyer understood that the Irish knew "how to cook potatoes to perfection, and [were] totally ignorant of the way to cook fish."

Soyer's text for his book was from Proverbs: Much food is in the tillage of the poor; but there is that is destroyed for want of judgment." A quotation worth the voyage.

options. It was Sunday, the French couple insisted on something mmistakably English, so we decided on meals at hotels, the Grill at the Dorchester and the River Room of the Savov.

The Dorchester Grill was not a disaster, but if the point of the exercise was looking at London through French eyes and examining its food with some of the French sense for self-preservation, then it seemed we got a peculiar steer from Gault, who rates the Grill as one of the city's 10 best restaurants. I ate some sole, a banal choice, but it was not the best. One of my companions went for the jugged hare. She said, "I don't believe

On the other hand, we had a glorious time at the River Room of the Savoy, although it was really a victory of England-forever over substance. The restaurant's floor shook and there were potted palms to go with the potted shrimp. All was pink, old rose. My friends adored the faintly biblical murals (a geographically unplaceable swampscape), but they were totally beside themselves about the harpist, a real harpist, playing somewhere between the dining room and the Thames. Sublime! London caricatoring itself! Henri Gault spoke of the marvelous haddock, but we all went for the first-rate roast beef from the trolley. The hors d'ocuvres were less terrific; one of my friends said they were oily and uninspired enough to remind him of the Club Méditerranée buffet in Romania, two days before the end of the season.

The French would not go home happy from London if they thought the city's eccentricity were slipping or its food really improving. A weekend across the Channel is not the right time to rattle any wellconsecrated preconceptions. The Air France stewardess said it all in an announcement on the return flight: "Please set your watches ahead.

France has one hour more than England."

A People's Palace Sold for Scrap

by Brigid Grauman

RUSSELS - The owner of a scrapmetal firm in Brussels was recently approached by a man who claimed to own a field full of old stones, rotting wood and metal beams that he had bough from the Belgian railroad. He was selling the metal for the equivalent of six U.S. cents a kilogram. They signed a contract, and the scrap metal merchant drove to the field, loaded his truck with steel sections and took them back to his yard. He sawed them into shorter pieces and piled them onto a barge to be sent off for smelting.

Only when the man had begun filling his truck for the fifth time were local police alerted that something odd was going on in the field where the remains of La Maison dn Peuple, masterpiece of the famous Belgian architect Victor Horta, had been lying for the last 18 years, waiting for the day of its increasingly mlikely reconstruction.

"You're not calling about that old iron again," chuckled a police inspector of the Brussels commune of Jette, where the illegal removal had just taken place. A lot of fuss over nothing," he said, adding that police were investigating but that the scrap metal firm was closed for the holidays. The man who had sold the material was being sought for questioning.
When La Maison du Peuple was completed in 1899, it was regarded by experts as one of the summits of modern architecture. Frank Lloyd Wright, Le Corbusier, Gropius and Mies Van der Rohe were among its most fervent admirers. As late as 1959 — 12 years after Horta's death -- an exhibition at the Museum of Modern Art in New York reconfirmed its permanent importance.

The building was constructed during the heyday of the Belgian Workers' Party. The ntroduction of a broader franchise had won the party its first seats in parliament and eniced its role in society, and when the decision was taken to build a prestigious new home for its activities in the city center, the Socialists approached Horta, already recognized as a oneer in the Art Nouveau style.

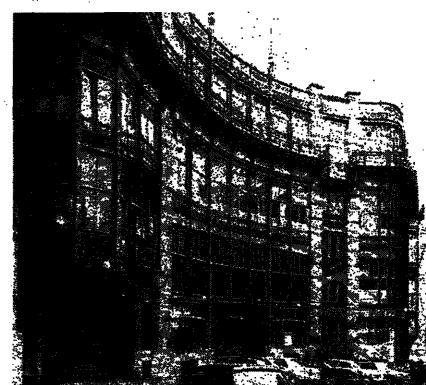

Horta was immediately attracted by the task. There was the challenge of a limited, sharply inclined and "devilishly irregular ter-And here was a chance to experin with the large-scale use of glass, "to build a palace that wasn't a palace, but a house in which air and light would be the luxury so long excluded from the workers' slums." The building was to be used by the party dministration for political and cultural meetings, social gatherings, a cafe. Hortz spent nine months on the preliminary plans before hiring 15 draftsmen who worked for a year and a half to make the blueprints. Every detail was meti-culously specified. Construction began in 1896 and took three years to complete, despite delayed deliveries and a rough winter. "Horta built it at the peak of his first creative period," says Jean Delhaye, his student, collaborator and most active champion, "after which he returned to the classical style he had previously condemned. He believed that the life of a building resided in its blueprint, which had to be rational and practical. He used every device to make the place appear monumental It was an exercise in architectural ingeninty, full of wrought iron, glass, red brick, steel pillars and columns like thin stalks gripping

the stones they supported."

Traditional architects were horrified. They described it as a heap of old iron and glass; the crowning aberration was a theater for 1,500 people at the top of the building. This large hall, on the third floor, was a vast shell of metal ribs under a rooftop terrace with a panoramic view of Brussels. The acoustics of the hall were so perfect that a whisper could be heard in the

"But the bricks soon looked too red for Socialist tastes," says Delhaye, and the gentle massacre began. The champagne-toned ironwork was painted dark gray and the bricks turned cream. The building became a negative of what was originally intended. An annex was built in the constraint electroction the light to built in the courtyard, obstructing the light to the ground-floor cafe. Dropped ceilings were added, and copper sheeting replaced the stained glass. Then rumors went around that the building was decaying and should be re-

The Belgian authorities turned a deaf ear to the worldwide expression of alarm at the danger to Horts's crowning achievement. The Central Society of Architecture, including Le Corbusier among 700 other signatories, composed a petition entreating the Belgians to preserve the building. At the International Congress of Architects in Venice in 1964, the protest was unanimous.

But within a year the Maison du Peuple was torn down. The state had agreed only to supply a credit of three million Belgian francs, which permitted the dismantling of the third-floor festival hall with its slim pillars, the ground floor cafe, the gym and part of a sweeping staircase. These were considered the most vainable of the rooms. "I rarely saw a building that was so hard to demolish," recalls Delhaye. "I watched as sparks flew in all directions when they cut into the metalwork."

Each piece was first numbered with paint, then taken on a bumpy journey to a warehouse without a roof near the African Museum outside Brussels. Over the years, rain poured down into the building and looters and art collectors helped themselves to iron and woodwork.

Plans to turn the warehouse into an annex to the museum meant moving the stones that had been lying unattended for 15 years and lugging them along to the field where they now he beside a railway track. The iron and the wood are rain-damaged, the stones chipped and cracked in transport

A barbed-wire fence was recently put up providing at least symbolic protection from hieves and bad weather. Rusty wrought iron; rotting doors and many huge unidentifiable stones, the numbers concealed on the bottom side, lie haphazardly in the grass.

At one time or another, various projects have been put forward for the partial reconstruction of the building. In Italy, the mayor of Turin offered to rebuild the Maison in his town, but the project was turned down; Beigian politicians reacted with indignation and hurt pride. The owners of the leftovers are the Belgian Central Society of Architecture and there is not much they can do now. Plans to integrate parts of the building within various. cultural centers fell through when local finances proved inadequate.

Without a shed to protect the metal and no budget for minimal upkeep, the years have taken their toll on one of the highlights of modern architecture. A few graceful railings from the third- and fourth-floor balconies are in the hands of the city metro authorities when plan to set the 14 fragments into a panel in one of the underground stations. A school stillowns some buts of a balcony, and the Horter House in Brussels stores a few columns and capitale

Now that most of the iron has been flogged as scrap, all hope has vanished of seeing the phoenix rise again from its ashes. "At the "most," says Delhaye, "we can distribute they stones and parts of the superstructure to varions museums, and they can become the frag-mented remnants of Horta's genius."

OME -- When Edward Gibbon met his muse on the steps of Rome's the trish in the by Capitol two centuries ago, the city at his feet was a living monument, a landscape in search of a biographer. The Briand loyce loss of tish historian picked up his pen and obliged in six volumes. Although few modern visitors to Rome can be bothered with Gibbon's particulars, they still expect the stones to inspire. Alas, that inspiration nowadays arrives more from a cappuccino than a roam around ied in a pot the ruins. When it comes to understanding Rome's architectural past, most tourists are frankly let down by the jumbledness of it all. Even Gibbon's imagination might have been distracted by today's crowds in the Forum and the Pantheon, ceaseless souvenir-peddling, odd or nonexistent museum hours, the general din and, above all, the famous fume-rich traffic and, above all, the famous fume-rich trains and, above all, the famous fume-rich trains and, above all, the famous fume-rich trains that has prompted the authorities to wrap so many marble landmarks in green netting.

There is an animalive, none's eternal part — surface pandemonium. Rome's eternal part — most of it undiscovered in Gibbon's time, and — lies about 30 feet (9) most of it indicates in Control of the still perfectly preserved — lies about 30 feet (9) meters) under Along this little-known subterranean itinerary, accessible through a dozen small doors and passageways, silence still reigns. The stones do not echo the nearest traffic jam.

Monuments are unravaged by "marble rot." In and the poor; the dead heat of summer, these are the coolest places in the city. And they're the only places where the sense of going backward in time is where the sense or going interly convincing.

To the archaeologically minded, the sites are among the most important in Italy. They range from a freecoed, second-century Temple of a freecoed, second-century Temple of a free to the excavated remains of Nero's Golden House. You can walk along the main street of a Roman burial ground beneath St. Peter's Basilica, or pay a visit to a mint-condition columbarium — a stuccoed chamber where the ashes of the dead have remained untouched for 18 centuries.

The narrow paths and stairways that lead to these pockets of antiquity are not designed for large groups, but are ideal for individual tra-velers. All are close to the city center, and a bonus is that entry is usually free or inexpen-

A few steps from the Colosseum, at the Church of San Clemente, 45 Via S. Giovanni in Laterano, is perhaps the most evocative spot in all Rome, the stuff of which history teachers' dreams are made. San Clemente is a perfect layer cake of the city's religious history: at the ground level is a 12th-century church; below that is the excavated 5th-century basilica; and deeper still is a pagan Mithraeum and two large Roman houses. At this lowest level, standing in a narrow first-century alleyway between thick tufa walls, you can almost hear half-hour tour of the lower levels, where slow and careful excavation has continued for more than 120 years. Entry is through a small door on the north wall, then down a stairway fined with antique fragments. These 20 steps go down about seven centuries to one of the earliest Christian churches, believed to have been built in the early 400s. It lasted until Robert Guiscard's Norman invesion in 1984, after which it was filled in, built over and forgotten. In the 19th century, a curious priest dug through the floor and rediscovered the older basilica. Archaeologists placed supporting pillars as they excavated eventually dig-ging down to the first-century rooms.

Frescoes depicting episodes from the life of St. Clement have survived the centuries in the damp earth and remain along the basilica walls. What's more striking about this lower church is the beauty of the architectural details — the sunken baptismal font, embedded marble columns and the primitive mosaic pave-

Near the apse is a stairway built in 300 A.D. Near the apse is a stairway built in 300 A.D. that leads down to the first-century level. The main rooms here — probably a nobleman's home — were used in the worship of Mithras, the buil-slaying god imported from Asia by Roman soldiers during the first and second centuries. Inside the Mithraic sanctuary is an altar to the god, discovered here in several pieces. It was probably vandalized by contem-porary Christians, who more than once chose to build an early church directly above an abandoned pagan temple.

You can explore the nearby Mithraic "school" for mitiates, as well as the rooms of the adjoining house, reached by crossing a back alley. The dozen rooms here are well-lit and often empty of tourists; the only sound is of an ancient spring that still gargles 30 feet below the modern city.

The emperor Nero's Golden House (Domns Aurea), entrance at 136 Via Labicana, once covered so much of Rome that the city was facetiously called "one house." Its center was here on the Esquiline Hill opposite the Coloscum, and succeeding emperous did such a good job of burying it under a complex of baths that it was forgotten for 15 centuries. When the chambers were rediscovered, Renaissance artists, including Raphael, lowered themselves through the ceiling to study the remarkable frescoes and strictors - scratching their names on the walls in a bit of forgivable

This vast labyrinth of more than 30 rooms is unmatched in Rome for both grandeur and gloom. Nero's interior decorator was the famed Fabullus, whose delicate style in fresco and stucco (later dubbed "grotesque") inspired so much decoration in Renaissance mansions and, some say, Raphael's Vatican loggias. One of Nero's rooms has frescoes that depict scenes of first-century Rome — a rare glimpse of the past. In other rooms are the characteristic framed landscapes, with miniature paintings of animals and gymnasts. There is a ceiling mosaic that shows Ulysses and the Cyclops, and several intact mosaic floors.

The architectural highlight is the octagonal hall, still lit by an oculus that opens through the ng into the modern park grounds above. Nearly all the ceilings here are vaulted -using what at the time was a revolutionary technique Other details match Nero's reputation for fancy: in one banquet room is a wall chamber where an indoor waterfall once fell at the feet of his recliming guests.

Open 9 A.M. to 1:30 P.M.; closed Monday.

Periodically closed to the public, but permission to visit may be obtained at the Soprintendenza Archeologica di Roma, 53 Piazza S. Maria Nova; sel: 679,03.33. The office is located just inside the Forum gates near the Colosseum. Admission 1,000 lire.

Although the excavations below St. Peter's silica are only 40 years old, the discoveries here have been amazing. A Roman burial ground, used first by pagans and then by early Christians, dates from the first century. Its double row of tombs and mausoleums presents an impressive street scene, and the architec-tural decoration is unique. Many of the tombs are rich in fresco and stucco work commissioned by the individual families who are buried here.

The English-speaking guide does an excellent and painstaking job, whether explaining the symbolic figures of a sarcophagus or the importance of the earliest Christian mosaic hich depicts Christ as the sun god). He builds a strong case for the Roman Catholic Church's contention that the bones of an elderman, discovered in the tomb below St. Peter's main altar, are those of the saint himself. The hourlong subterranean tour also explains the problems Constantine faced when building the first St. Peter's Basilica in 324. (He had to cut off the roofs of some of the mausolearns, for one thing.) It is an easily digested history lesson, not to be missed.

Visits must be arranged in advance at the Office of the Excavations, Vatican City; tel: 698.53.18. To reach the office, enter through the door to the left of the basilica, past the Swiss Guard. No children under 14 are admitted. Admirate. 2 000 E. mission 3,000 lire.

In the shadow of the Colosseum, the quiet corner of SS. Giovanni e Paolo (located in the piazza of the same name) evokes medieval Rome so well that it's become a fashionable place for weddings. Few realize that below the attractive 12th-century church lies a two-story Roman house that dates to the second century. The rooms hold original decorative frescoes, some in surprisingly good repair.

The lower levels are entered through a recurtain on the right of the apse down two flights of stairs. The maze of ancient rooms is a little confusing, but the visitor does not need a historical reconstruction to enjoy the wonderful paintings and the sense of being in someone's home. It is enough to know that these Roman rooms were used as a burial chamber by Christians in the fourth century, when the first church was built above. The Christians had already turned one small room here into a chapel and decorated it with paintings of a priest and three martyrs awaiting execution. It may be the earliest artistic rendering of a martyrdom, and stepping into the room the visitor senses that this was a sacred place.

An entirely different effect is made by the pagan frescoes in several of the 20 rooms that make up the Roman mansion. One delightful wall painting shows Proserpine returning from Hades, flanked by Ceres and Bacchus, with cupids escorting them in small boats. In the nearby dining room, frescoes depict naked youths surrounded by birds of every kind peacocks, flamingos, ducks, parrots and quail. The work here is exquisite, and these are some of the rare Roman frescoes that remain in situ.

The Passionist Fathers who run the church including several English-speaking priests are usually willing to play tour guide to the trickle of daily visitors. They will explain that tradition links the site with the house of John and Paul, two soldiers martyred under the apostate emperor Julian. Their burial place was thought to be beneath the main altar. Tradition also says that three later saints were martyred here after they were discovered praying at the tomb — a legend perhaps illus-trated in the religious frescoes in the underground chapel.

Lower levels open 8 A.M. to noon and 3:30 P.M. to 5:30 P.M.; closed Sunday morning. No charge.

The tiny church of Santa Prisca, Piazza S. Prisca, is almost lost amid the trees on the circus Maximus. Aventine Hill, just above the Circus Maximus Here, as at San Clemente, early Christians built their church directly over a temple to the pagan god Mithras, which was built into a Roman house. This Mithraeum was only discovered in the 1940s, and it is remarkably wellpreserved despite a recent lapse in upkeep; the frescoes have not had time to disintegrate. The acristan leads visitors through a small garden at the back of the modern church to the door of the excavations --- from there they are on their

Much of the fresco and stucco decor is still in place, and the visitor gets a clear idea of the temple's layout, with separate rooms for separate rites. A vestibule where animals were sacrificed is still intact. One third-century painting is particularly interesting. It shows the seven stages of initiation into the cult, with scenes of a banquet and a sacrifice. The environment here is less suggestive than at San Clemente, but the details are more fascinating. Lower level open 10 A.M. to noon on Monday and Friday. Admission 300 lire.

Lower basilica at the Church of San Clemente.

The Columbarium of Pomponius Hylas, a first-century burial chamber is a little further from the city center along the garden-lined Via di Porta San Sebastiano (the 118 bus from the Colosseum stops here). At No. 9 is the entrance to the Tomb of the Scipio Family, itself worthy of a visit. From here, the custodian leads visitors across a small park to a steep, covered

The decorated chamber below is probably the most perfectly preserved architectural relic in Rome. It is tiny, meant to serve for Hylas's family and perhaps a few others. The ceramic urns that hold their cremated remains are set in niches along the walls, which are covered with paintings, mosaics and stucco reliefs. The 10-minute visit will make a lasting impression. A.D. is the Basilica of Porta Maggiore, 7 Piazza di Porta Maggiore, near the train station. The well-lit ceiling and walls of this small under-ground temple are covered with fine stucco eliefs that are in near-original condition. The themes are varied, but many seem to refer to stages of the soul's progress. The temple was carved out of the soft tufa rock, probably by a Pythagorean sect, and is thought to have been used as a prototype for the first Christian basilicas in Rome. In the apse is a large relief depicting the death of Sappho, and the ceiling's centerpiece is The Rape of Ganymede. Alongside the mythological figures are praying men, pygmies, children, animals and garlands worked in a delicate style. They have invited interpretation since their discovery in 1916 but so far no one is certain of their allegorical

While the Mexican National Railways still gives romantic names to its almost-ancient U.S.-built sleeping and dining cars, rail buffs should be on notice that the time may be growing late indeed to sample what's still left of old-fashioned splendor on the country's railways - certainly on the 1,200-mile (1,928kilometer) line from the Texas border to Mexico City.

> Some years back, the Mexicans bought train sets that had once run under the name of the old New York central's premier New York-Chicago express, the Twentieth Century Limited, but now the passenger rolling stock is very old and not well-maintained. These facts, coupled with the Mexican economic crisis, suggest that the national railway is not likely to be modernizing in the near future. In fact, one could argue that the days of the service between Cindad Juarez on the Rio Grande and Mexico City, now limited to one train daily in each direction, may be numbered — certainly for the international traveler, unless improvements can be made.

For a recent passenger, however, it was very pleasant riding across that vast desert stretch with the great mountains in the distance. No matter that the water was cold and the radio nonfunctioning in my roomette in the Mont Blanc, or that a fly or two took flight. It was still nice, after the minced-meat patty at Copacabana, to pull down the made-up bed and to recline in splendor. A real surprise was the smooth track, much of it welded rail, eliminating clacks and bumps.

Yet, best of all, was the price. Even with EXICO CITY — From the stopovers it was 4,800 pesos, about $32, includsplendid heights of Mont Blanc, where there was no hot water for On the Mexican side of the Rio Grande just old American coaches, dining car and one or more sleeping cars rolls out of the shoddy old station at Cindad Juárez every evening at 6:25. This is El Frontizero, the one and only express nowadays on this line to Mexico City, and the scheduled running time is 36 hours and 30 minutes.

That means two nights on the train, repeated menns in the diner, and early exhaustion of private carry-on beverage supplies for the un-wary traveler. It also adds up to a lot of scenery

ed because of night travel. On the other hand, it is possible to break up the train trip a bit and to see some cities en route. This can be done by boarding another train first - an earlier daytime train - and switching to the Frontizero down the line. Travelers accustomed to the convenience and huxury of West European train service will need to make some quick adjustments. Trains do not roll across the U.S.-Mexican border as they are able to slip past frontiers in Western Europe. In fact, they don't roll at all. It is necessary for the air, train, or auto traveler arriving in El Paso to make his own arrangements to get over to the Frontizero in Ciudad Juarez. Also, even with reservations, it is best to arrive long before train time because of the confusion at the ticket windows and to pass through costoms Starting from El Paso one morning. I took a taxi for the relatively short run across the Rio Grande, through a good part of central Ciudad Juárez and on to the railway station. There were no formalities at the border, but for the trip into the interior I had already obtained the

Since I had selected to skip the first leg of the journey on the Frontizero, I boarded the day stream by headed northward. As our train then train for Chibuahua, leaving at 10:10 A.M. for the four-hour run across the desert. This train was billed as an Italian-built, self-propelled autovia but turned out to be three old coaches without air-conditioning behind a diesel loco-

The sun beat down and we high-balled across the desert, enjoying the fresh, dry air. It was like rolling through an old movie set with all those sad adobe villages, scrubby bushes and far-off mountains — John Wayne or even Pancho Villa might have materialized at any

After passing some stubby comfields, we rolled into the dusty outskirts of Chihuahua in an area of low houses. We were right on time. I grabbed a cab and took the one-mile ride up to the center of town and El Presidente Hotel. I had brought my bags, knowing that El Fronti-zero would not be leaving for Mexico City until midnight. I checked them at the hotel, cha money at a favorable rate and enjoyed an excellent soup, salad and spicy meat platter 700 pesos, including tip. From the rooftop restaurant there was a fine view of the city. Later, heading back to the station. I ticketed myself for Mexico City, with another stopover at Aquascaliente en route, and boarded El Frontizero just before midnight. The roomy compartment was comfortable indeed, and the eping was great, especially under a couple of blankets, as we headed upwards to elevations a mile high. In the morning I woke up to find we were on the outskirts of Torreon in the state of Coa-huila, 516 miles south of the Rio Grande but still in high desert and scrub country. About 500 miles north of Mexico City, we pulled off onto a spor track and watched the huffing, overweight trainman (who doubled as porter and was content with a small tip at the end of the ride) laboriously throw a switch.

That was to permit the other Frontizero to rolled south toward Mexico City, the great desert slowly began to change into green tropical scenery. There were still high mountains off to the west and now some farms, orchards and truck gardening plots, yet despite the richer soil the overall area was poor.

The train, now 14 cars long and pulled by three diesel locomotives, mounted a steep hill into the old cathedral town of Zacatecas, a handsome city surrounded by green fields, farms and wooded areas. We were 430 miles from Mexico City.

Next came fields of high corn, cattle ranches and extensive vineyards. At Aguascalientes ! again detrained, breaking the trip to take a look at a provincial city with its hish, park-like central plaza — the typical zócalo — complete with fern-like trees, fashionable, strolling ladies and tootling band. Silverware, jewelery and leather goods are all good buys here, and the Cava Domecq houses in its cellars some 100,000 bottles of Los Reyes red wine, a kind of Mexican burgundy, not to be ignored in a land more noted for its tequila and beer.

On another version of El Frontizero, we were under way again on time at 6.45 P.M., with an overnight run in the high mountains to the capital ahead of us. After dining in Copacabana Beach, I awakened early to catch the views of the mountainous copper-colored landscape and gaze out the window during the long, long ride through the suburbs of the capital. We came to a stop 90 minutes late in the modern passenger station at 8:25 A.M.

P.S. For the hearty rail buff, there is a 260mile trip about 12 hours in a jammed old train from Mexico City to Veracruz on the Gulf of Mexico through some marvelous tropical mountain scenery. Lots of stops. Lots of creaks and pains on arrival - but a trip to re-

Bach, Beethoven, Mozart and Seoul

by Terry Trucco

EOUL - It was sultry and sticky in the junior high school classroom, but the 23 young women surrounded by instruments and masic stands were oblivious to everything but Mozart. With a nod from the conductor, Lim Wonsik, strains of Divertimento No. 1 filled the air, so crisp and professional that it was hard to believe the musicians' average age was just 17. For most, music has shaped their entire lives. Sohn Mise, a first-year student at Seoul University, started violin lessons in the second grade. Fifteenyear-old Kim Yu Jeong has played the violin since she was 5.

The Seoul Youth Chamber Orchestra was gearing up for its appearance Friday at a youth music festival in Aberdeen, Scotland. It is the first Korean orchestra to perform in Europe. Visitors to the South Korean capital are often surprised by the mania for Western classical music that permeates nearly every level of society here. And though Seoul has its share of rock enthusiasts, in most instances the music wafting in the background was composed by Bach, Beethoven or Tcharkovsky.

Cab drivers listen to Seoul's classical music station or serenade riders with Handel cassettes. Music-box strains of Beethoven's "Fitr Elise" greet telephone callers placed on hold. aries enhances its popularity.

Dvorak's imposing New World Symphony heralds a blouse commercial on television. And Seoul's Dae Han Music Company is always jammed with customers leafing through volumes of sheet music as if they were magazines.
All this seems striking given South Korea's relatively brief history of occidental music. Once known as the Hermit Kingdom, Korea opened its doors to the outside world in 1876, nearly 20 years after Japan. Classical music arrived soon after, brought by hymn-singing Christian missionaries and military bands. Yet it was not until the close of World War II and the subsequent end of Japan's 35-year occupation of the Korean peninsula — that classical music reached the average Korean. Indeed, the real history of Western classical music in Korea spans just over 30 years.

Most observers agree that much of classical music's appeal derives from the simple fact that it is Western. "We want to be Westernized, and in a superficial way a knowledge of Western classical music is a status symbol," says Peggy Kim, a mother of two in Seoul. Music on records, tapes, radio and television, reaches the average South Korean more reachly than theater or dance.

Christianity is also spreading rapidly here, and Lim, the youth orchestra's conductor, maintains that the close associations of classical music with Korea's early Christian mission-

Music lessons, which are time-consuming and costly, carry social cachet. A father casually mentions that he has just purchased for his 12-year-old daughter a violin costing the equivalent of $5.000.

But whatever the social superficialities, South Korean musicians have a genuine affinity for the Western classics. Korean-born musicians can be found in symphony orchestras the world over, and a number of soloists have gained an international following.

Forty-three South Korean colleges and universities provide music instruction, and hundreds of young musicians go abroad for advanced study each year. Lim estimates that some 2,000 South Koreans are studying in Europe, Japan and America, with more than 60 at the Juilliard School of Music in New York, where Lim studied in 1948.

While the classical music boom extends to Koreans of all ages and backgrounds, it is chiefly mothers and daughters who are caught up in the music-teaching phenomenon. Seoul Yewon, established some 30 years ago and modeled after New York's High School for the Performing Arts, enrolls more than 1,800 students of art, dance and music in its junior and senior high schools. But only about 300 students are boys. "In Korea, sons do not usually study music," observes Park Cheong Sook, an English teacher at the school.

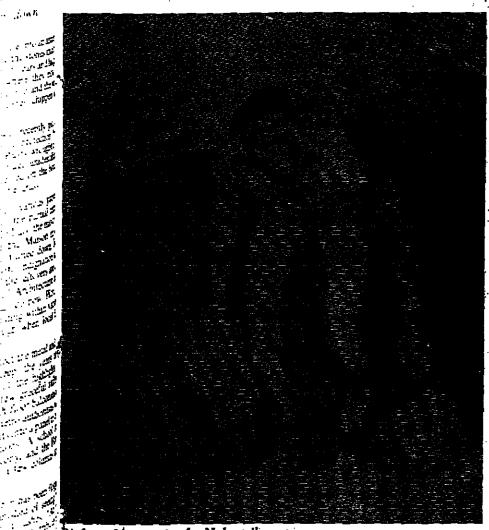

Though some claim this attitude is changing. many cling to the belief that a developing country like South Korea should channel its young men into economy-building fields, leavng the arts to women.

In a nation where men and women do not always share equal social status, a career in music can provide women with some attractive benefits. Matchmakers claim that mastery of the piano or violin greatly improves a young woman's chances for marriage into a desirable

A woman who joins a symphony orchestra, chamber group or, better yet, tours the world as a soloist earns enormous national admiration. A career in music is one of the few accepted by Korean society for married women with children. And those who teach music also command high regard, as do instructors in most fields here.

The life of a young Korean music student is one of determination and discipline. The average music student practices between three and six hours a day, often rising at dawn to squeeze in a few practice hours before class.

What drives these young musicians? "Usually their mothers," says Peggy Kim. "I think many mothers wish they could have studied music themselves, but the country's living standard wasn't high enough when they were

Lightweight Plastics Are Challenging Glass in the Market for Drink Bottles

EW YORK — Nathaniel C. Wyeth, a research engineer at Du Pont, was dismayed by the flimsy plastic bottles available in the 1950s.

Fill one with a carbonated beverage, the now-retired Mr. Wyeth says, and the next morning you'd have a basketball."

So he set out to develop a sturdier version, ultimately inventing the PET bottle, so called because it is made of polyethylene terephthalate. It has become the standard 2-liter bottle for soft drinks. More than 2.5 billion PET bottles were produced in 1982, representing sales of $625 million for bottle makers. That market is now saturated, the manufacturers say, but they insist

The move to plastics is that the PET bottle has only begun to grow. Now they have intro-duced one-liter and half-liter softdrink bottles, and they predict that the PET bottle will eventually become the standard container for wine, liquor, beer and a wide var-

'a classic shift' in the marketplace, says Du PET has some advantages over Pont's Malcolm Smook. glass, the material that plastics producers hope to displace. While both are clean and clear, PET is lighter than glass and is unbreakable. In the so-called "bottle bill" states, which require soft-drink and beer companies to accept the return of bottles and cans on which deposits have been paid by consumers, some supermarkets handle only plastic soft-drink bottles because of their convenience. Because recycling plastic is difficult, however, such laws could limit PET's growth in the long run.

H. Edward Schollmeyer, a packaging analyst at Paine Webber Mitchell Husching provides that each of the testing ill dealing about the convenience.

Hutchins, predicts that sales of glass bottles will decline 2 to 5 percent a year from now until at least 1986. And he expects "dramatic growth" for PET bottles over the same period.

It's "a classic shift" in the marketplace, says Malcolm A. Smook, manager of patents and regulatory affairs in Du Pont's polymer products division. The company got its patent on PET bottles in 1973. Du Pont's facilities were fully utilized, so it began licensing the process to bottle makers. There are now 28 licensees in the United States.

The world's largest producer of PET bottles is Sewell Plastics, a division of Dorsey Corp. Sewell's sales grew to $314 million last year from $52 million in 1977—"in large measure due to PET bottles," says John T. Pollock, Dorsey's chief executive officer.

'Bright Future' in Plastics

A year ago Mr. Pollock sold Dorsey's Chattanooga Glass division. "The bright future for us was in plastic rather than glass packaging," he said, due to the "enormous universe for conversion." Other companies have adopted a similar strategy, with Dart & Kraft selling its Thatcher Glass division and Owens-Illmois Inc. adding a PET bottle division. PET was a polymer already being used for boiling frozen foods in clear plastic bags, among other applications, when Mr. Wyeth reoriented its molecular structure, strengthening it against carbonation pressures.

Since PET weighs less than one-fifth as much as glass, it was first used

As a packaging material, however, PET has serious drawbacks. It may not work as well in smaller sizes, where weight is less of a factor. And smaller bottles have a higher surface-to-volume ratio, making them more susceptible to air infiltration, which can lead to spoilage.

This is a major concern with beer and many kinds of perishable foods.

At the moment, a PET beer bottle has a maximum shelf life of 12 weeks, too short for most brewers to consider. And test-marketing with foods has been limited to acidic products, such as mustard and pickles, which are little affected by air infiltration.

Another problem is that PET cannot be used at the high temperatures

Another problem is that PET cannot be used at the high temperannes characteristic of many processed foods at the moment of canning or bottling. Experts suggest that future packaging may combine materials, merging the strength of PET with some impermeable coating.

"We're still waiting for the right system," said Mr. Smook.

According to Dana Duxbury, solid-waste specialist for the Leagne of Women Voters, PET has two other serious disadvantages.

The first problem is its cost compared with that of glass. Although the bottler may pay 19 cents for a one-liter PET bottle and 28 cents for a one-liter class bottle she said the glass bottle can be refilled ten times or liter glass bottle, she said, the glass bottle can be refilled ten times or

The second problem is the small market for the vast quantities of PET ed m. "botue bui" si but such capacity is limited.

Mr. Smook acknowledged that a PET surplus in such states existed a year ago but said that market conditions had now changed. This plus company-sponsored research to find additional uses, he said, should mean a good balance between supply and demand — "assuming" he added, "that not too many more states pass bottle bills."

Spokesmen for the glass industry concede the inroads made by plastic but deny that it will overtake glass. "Glass is still the standard for product protection," said William Sadd of the Glass Packaging Institute. And Predicasts Inc., a Cleveland-based marketing research concern, estimates that glass containers will outnumber those made from plastic well into the next decade because glass "will continue to benefit from legislative and ecological pressures in favor of returnable bottles." New York Times Service

U.S. Says Corn Crop Cut by 38%

WASHINGTON - A summer drought and the largest plantings cutback on record will reduce the U.S. com crop this year to 5.24 billion bushels, the smallest in nine years, the Agriculture Department said Thursday.

The first estimate of this autumn's com harvest was 38 percent malier than last year's record of 8.4 billion bushels and the smallest since 1974, when another drought cut the harvest to 4.7 billion bush-

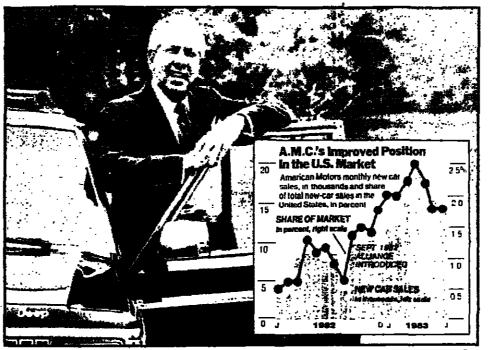

Shortly before the announcement, soybean futures prices shot to new highs while corn was steady and wheat was lower Thursday on the Chicago Board of Trade. There was little concern that the report' would prompt a selloff on Friday, said Richard Loewy, a grain ana-lyst in New York with Prudential-

Mr. Loewy said the rally in soybeans had indicated that traders were confident that the report would not depress prices. If the report had indicated a harvest greater than the market expected, the traders would not believe it, Mr. Loewy said. A smaller-thanexpected figure would have been likely to push prices higher on Friday, he added.

The department forecast the soybean crop at 1.84 billion bushels, down 19 percent from last year's record of 2.28 billion bushels. Average nationwide soybean yield was estimated to be 29.7 bushels an acre. The department predicted wheat production would be 2.42 billion bushels, down 14 percent. Most of the crop has been harvest-

Based on an Aug. I survey, the department's Crop Reporting Board forecast the U.S. average com yield to be 99.9 bushels an acre, down from last year's 114.8bushel record and the smallest peracre yield since 1980.

When harvesting begins, plenti-ful corn supplies from record 1981 and 1982 crops — a record carryover of 3.4 billion bushels — will be on hand, but the July heat wave during the crucial corn pollination period and the cutbacks in plantings already have pushed up feed costs for livestock producers.

W. Paul Tippett, the American Motors chairman, with the Wagoneer, one of a line of new Jeep vehicles expected to improve the company's prospects after its introduction this fall.

AMC Considers Its Losses as 'Dues' It Must Pay on Way to Profitability

By John Holusha

New York Times Service DETROIT - Executives of American Motors Corp. are not trying, as the saying goes, to lose money on each sale but to make it up in volume. It just looks that way at the moment.

W. Paul Tippett, the company's chairman, did not object, for example, to a somewhat simplistic calculation that showed AMC with stronger sales this year than last but losing about $800 per vehicle this year compared with $534 last year.

"I could take that $800 a car, roughly calculated, and bring it way down, if I got rid of half our engineering staff," Mr. Tippett said in a recent Instead, Mr. Tippett says, those losses are the result of a carefully prepared strategy, one he predicts will begin to bear fruit shortly.

The company's basic problem has been that it never had a consistent product program," Mr. Tippett said in an interview. "We would introduce a product with nothing behind it. There would be a temporary sales increase; a temporary profit increase, in some cases, and then the company would sink back into the

The continuing losses at a time when the other American auto companies are reporting record or near-record profits, Mr. Tippett said, are occuring because the company is paying its "dues" to establish a broader line of products based on autos designed by the French company, Renault, and on AMCs own

Those dues, he said, include the cost of launching new models, selling off discontinued lines, aggressive pricing to gain market share and "an engineering department that's staffed for a company twice our

Some of the results are already apparent in increased sales and a share of the market for domestic autos that was 3 percent in the first seven months of Earnings, however, have lagged. Mr. Tippett declines to predict when the company will next make a profit (it has had 13 consecutive quarterly losses). He says only that "the second half of 1983 will be a lot better than the second half of 1982, and things will look up considerably after that." In 1982's second half, the company lost $33.8 million.

However, Donald DeScenza, an auto industry analyst with the Donaldson, Lufkin & Jenrette Securities Corp., predicts that the company will be close to breaking even by the fourth quarter of 1983 and will earn $100 million in 1984.

The company has announced that for the first time in three years it is hiring. Mr. Tippett said the company needs 1,000 to 1,200 workers at its Kenosha, Wisconsin, plant by Oct. 1 to increase production of the popular Alliance and soon-to-be-introduced Encore subcompacts. Up to 800 of those workers will be laid off employees and the rest will be new, Mr.

Tippett said.

One major reason that the company's prospects are expected to improve further, starting this fall, is the

Dutch/Shell Net Increased 63% In 2d Quarter

By Bob Hagerry

International Herald Terbung LONDON -The Royal Dutch/ Shell group reported a surge in sec-ond quarter profit Thursday and said the drop in oil demand ap-pears to have bottomed out.

Shell's second quarter net income climbed 63 percent from a year before to £621 million ($918.7 million). Revenue rose 10 percent

For the first half, pet income was up 42 percent to £1.13 billion and revenue grew 12 percent to £25.9

The results were well above most forecasts, but most of the difference came from a reassessment of tax provisions, providing a gain of £94 million, and an unexpected gain in inventory values. Share analysis said the underlying performance was about in line with expectations. Shares of Shell Transport & Trading, the British arm of the Anglo-Dutch group, shot up 30 pence to 632 pence.

The group pointed to a significant increase in profit from exploration and production outside North America. That increase more than offset a decline in the manufacturing, marine and marketing sectors.

The chemical operations showed a small profit, compared with a year-earlier loss, while metals remained in the red and coal maintained a small profit.

The group also reported an extraordinary loss of £36 million resulting from the write-off of a U.S. nuclear reprocessing plant.

Shell's refining and marketing operations in Europe were squeezed by the strangth of the dollar, which raised feedstock costs. particularly in France and Germany. Overall, the group reported a currency-translation loss of £39 million in the quarter, compared with a loss of £33 million a year

Commenting on the oil market, Shell noted improvement in spot prices for crude and oil products during the quarter. "Along with the major industrial countries," the company said, "there are indications that, in aggregate, Free World oil demand trends are no longer falling."

British Petroleum is due to report its second quarter results Sept. The brokerage of Wood, Mackenzie & Co. predicted this week that BP's net income should rise 25 percent to £200 million. That was £50 million more than the previous Wood forecast.

"There's a lot more confidence in the oil sector than there has been for a long time," noted Jeremy Thompson, oil analyst at Hoare Govert Ltd.

Yamani Says OPEC Quotas May Increase

KUWAIT — The Organiza-tion of Petroleum Exporting Countries is likely to raise its 17.5-million-barrel-a-day production limit in the last quarter of this year, Sheikh Ahmed Zaki Yamani, the Saudi Arabian oil minister, was quoted as saying Thursday.

But Sheikh Yamani, in a statement to the official Kuwait News Agency at the Saudi summer resort of Taif, said he was strongly opposed to any in-crease in oil prices.

"Saudi Arabia is against any hike in oil prices over the cur-rent $29-a-barrel level until the vear 1985."

He also said Saudi Arabia's oil output last month was five million barrels a day. Some recent reports have suggested that the Saudis have been pumping oil in excess of their five-million-barrel-a-day quota.

He was attending meetings of the Organization of Arab Petroleum Exporting Countries and the Gulf Cooperation Council.

Phibro, Merrill Offer Warrants on T-Bonds

By Bob Hagerty

LONDON - Phibro-Salomon and Merrill Lynch are offering investors outside the United States a chance to bet on lower interest

Both companies announced Thursday offers of warrants giving buyers the right to buy U.S. Treasury bonds or notes over the next 6 to 12 months. The offers came two days after Transamerica Financial Corp. pioneered the idea with an issue that was canceled after its price proved too high.

But Quadrex Securities, which managed the Transamerica offer, said that it was working on another attempt with modified terms and that other firms are likely to jump Some analysts said the Euro-

bond market appeared to be entering one of its periodic binges of taking a good idea to excess. "Here we go," a dealer said, "creative fi-nancing, monkey see, monkey do." Early in the day, Phibro-Salo-mon announced an offering man-

BUSINESS BRIEFS

U.S. Business Inventories Fell 0.1% In June as Sales Continue to Increase

WASHINGTON (UPI) — U.S. business inventories shrank 0.1 percent in June, a sign that healthy sales increases were still using up goods faster than they were being produced, the Commerce Department said

The month's 2.1 percent increase in sales took the inventory-to-sales ratio to a new record low in June, with only 1.36 months of supply on hand in warehouses and on wholesalers' shelves.

"U.S. businesses are accelerating ordering and production to accommodate stronger-than-expected sales while avoiding digging still deeper into their inventories," Commerce Secretary Malcolm Baldrige said. "Further increases in hiring and output are in store for the months

Inventories were valued at $505 billion in June, $700 million less than in May, the department said. Sales totaled $371.6 billion, $7.5 billion more than in May.

Australia to Subsidize Steel Industry

CANBERRA, Australia (AP) - In an effort to aid its slumping steel industry, the Australian government announced on Thursday a series of subsidies and measures designed to protect the companies from foreign

Australia's steel producers, facing declining revenues, have laid off more than 10,000 workers in the past two years while pressing the

The minister of industry and commerce, John Button, said the gover ment will provide up to 71.6 million Australian dollars ($60.9 million) each year in direct subsidies to the local steel industry for the next five years. It also will impose tariffs and quotas on foreign producers to ensure that domestic producers keep 80 percent of the Australian market,

Swedish Firm Signs Satellite Contract

STOCKHOLM (Renters) — The Swedish space corporation Svenska Rymdbolaget said Thursday that it has signed a contract with France's Acrospatiale and the Eurosatellite consortium to develop a satellite for ylevision and data exchanges in the Nordic area.

The president of Svenska Rymdbolaget, Fredrik Engstroem, said the contract was worth 650 million krona ($81.9 million). Other contracts for an earth station and satellite control systems have yet to be signed to bring the cost of the entire project up to around 1.3 billion krons. Sweden and Norway agreed earlier this year to cooperate in the development of a Tele-X satellite, Scandinavia's first, which is due to be launched by a European Ariane rocket in 1986.

U.S. Judge Denies Paradyne Request LARGO, Florida (Reuters) — Paradyne Corp. said Thursday that a federal district judge has denied the company's motion to dismiss a complaint filed against it by the Securities and Exchange Commission on March 25. Paradyne said the court's ruling is procedural and not a ruling on the merits of the SEC complaint. The company said that if it answers the complaint it would assert that it properly obtained a contract for a Social Security Administration data acquisition and response systems. 📆 Caltex, Indonesia to Begin Talks

JAKARTA (Reuters) — Formal negotiations between Caltex Pacific Indonesia, the country's biggest oil producer, and the Indonesian government on renewal of contract terms for Caltex's oldest fields will start on Sunday, senior government sources said Thursday.

The sources said that they expect no major problems in the talks.

Caltex is jointly owned by Standard Oil of California and Texaco. The talks will determine how much profit Caltex can take from major oil producing fields, including the Minas field, in central Sumatra.

The contracts in question are due to expire this year. Caltex was assured by the government in 1971 that after the contracts expired it could continue working the areas on a production-sharing basis until the

The new vehicles are 21 inches (53.3 centimeters) shorter and 1,000 pounds (450 kilograms) lighter than the ones they replace and are expected to compete suc-cessfully with General Motors's S-Blazer and Ford Motor's Bronco II, both smaller, four-wheel drive utility vehicles.

More important for AMC's earnings outlook, the Jeep vehicles, which will be priced at $10,000 to $15,000 depending on equipment, will have a profit margin before overhead is deducted of about $2,500 each, according to analysts. That compares to a variable profit estimated at about $800 a car for the company's hot-selling Alliance.

Though a distant fourth in the gargantuan automobile business, American Motors sales last year of $2.8 billion make it the 139th largest industrial company in the nation. Nevertheless, many securities analysts who follow the auto industry disregard AMC, largely because it is controlled by Renault's 46.4 percent stockholding. That, however, did not stop investors in the United States from buying 10 million shares of the company's common stock in April at $5.625.

KING SOLOMON By Romain Gary. 255 pp. $12.95. Harper & Row. 10 E. 40th St., New York. N.Y. 10022.

Reviewed by Michiko Kakutani

R OMAIN Gary's novel, "Forest of Anger," published in 1944, not only depicted the brutal education in history received by a young boy during World War II but also created a devastating portrait of the modern world ushered in by that war — a world filled with suffering and pain and nearly bereft of hope. That same theme of innocence betrayed and a sense of metaphysical despair would permeate all of Gary's subsequent works, and in retrospect they seem to have haunted his own life as

In 1980, 15 months after the apparent suicide of his former wife, the actress Jean Seberg, Gary died from a self-inflicted gunshot wound.

"King Solomon" was published initially in France under the pseudonym Emile Ajar — a name he affected as a hoax to fool the critics.

Clearly, "King Solomon" reflects an extraordinarily anguished state of mind. Less interesting as a novel than as a philosophical study in world weariness and despair, the book explores in obsessive detail — and with exces-sive repetition — the condition of man in this sad, post-Edenic world. The characters dwell on the atrocities committed by the Nazis, the Cambodians and the Red Brigades; they question the nature of a God who can allow such terrible events to take place; and they lament the passing of an earlier, more innocent age, when people still believed in acts of heroism and faith.

While the despair in Gary's earlier books was mediated by satire and playful displays of Gallic wit, "King Solomon" is relentless in its solemnity. Descriptions are laden with a metaphysical subtext — "another doorbell that doesn't ring," observes one character portentously — and even the most casual of conversa-tions tend to turn into Socratic dialogues about the plight of modern man. "Twe just been talking to a young woman who was telling me she'd decided to burn herself to death as a protest," King Solomon says to the narrator. ²She didn't say what she wanted to protest against. Though it's obvious. Disgust. Help-lessness. Defiance. Anguish. Indignation."

King Solomon, the title character of the book, runs SOS Volunteers, an organization that people can telephone, day or night, "when the world becomes too hard to bear," and

Jeannot, the book's young, wisecracking narrator, soon enlists in its army of salvation. Both Jeannot and King Solomon, of course, are familiar Gary characters - idealists, whose romantic visions have come crashing up against the ugliness and stupidity of the world around them - and their alliance provides the author with plenty of opportunities to examine, as he did in "White Dog," the impotence and selfishness of liberal humanitarianism. النال

Indeed as Gary sees it, good sumaritans are motivated not by a simple goodness of heart but by a complex set of emotions - including guilt, a desire to protest God's injustice, and a kind of cowardice that leads them to substitute an abstract love of humanity for warmth and caring in their own lives.

In Jeannot's case, vague feelings of pity lead him to carry on an affair with Cora, a lonely 65-year-old chanteuse. For Jeannot, there is nothing personal about the relationship -her aging body, in fact, repels him — but he naturally has difficulty explaining to Cora that his interest is purely theoretical, that it actually stems from the same humanitarian impulseed that makes Sierra Club members want to save baby seals from being clubbed to death by hunters. "I could have told her," says Jeannot. "Mademoiselle Cora, I love you like I love all the other endangered species, but that would have been too remote for her. If she'd realized there was anything of the seaguil or the baby seal mixed up in it she wouldn't have liked it."

After many, many pages, however, this messy affair suddenly untangles: Cora realizes that she really loves King Solomon, and the two go off to Nice, where they presumably live happily ever after. Jeannot, meanwhile, finds a real girlfriend and invents a promising new life. Unfortunately, this bright ending has a contrived, slightly phony taste to it; the promise of salvation through love seems like something more wished for than believed. Given the salvation trajectory of his own life, it seems that Gary had difficulty believing in it himself.

HALF a century ago black bridge players had virtu-ally no opportunities to play in clubs and tournaments. They therefore formed their own organization; and although the discrimination that provoked their action withered away in the 1950's, the American Bridge Association has continued to flourish. It recently celebrated its 50th anniversary in New York.

A fascinating book, "A Nos-talgic Reminiscence in the American Bridge Association," has been written for the or a desire to show off. West 30 and would surely rank

In attempting to carry out this plan, he slightly overstepped the bounds of legality.

New York Times Service NEW YORK -- Since Bowie Kuhn announced that he would no longer be a candidate for another term as baseball commissioner, a number of other candidates have begun to emerge. They didn't want to seem to covet Kuhn's job while he was still trying to convince the Marx Brothers that he had not totally run baseball into the ground.

NFL Faces 1983 Season Amid Suspicion, Uncertainty and Controversy

Athletes in Helsinki Take Day Off; Fans Focus on Decathlon

HELSINKI — The clash between Jurgen Hingsen of West Germany and Daley Thompson of Britain for the unofficial title of world's greatest athlete was still in doubt Thursday less than 24 hours before the start of the decathlon competition at the World Track and Field Championships.

مكذا مذلكصل

Thompson, the Olympic, European and Commonwealth Games champion, is delaying his decision to compete until the last possible moment. A nagging groin injury has disrupted his training schedule, and he says he will only take part if

"I'm thinking only about being 100 percent. For me, there's no point in competing to finish second," Thompson said before leaving for Helsinki in advance of the other British team members.

There has been no further news about his fitness since then. The Londoner, smiling and affable in public, is short-tempered and

"I'll make up my mind when I wake up Friday," was all Thompson would say. The only other clue as to whether he would line up for the 100 meters - the first of the 10 disciplines - was when Thompson asked some of his British colleagues what time the team bus was due to leave for the Olympic Stadium.

game left Hingsen unperturbed, and the West German geared himself to having to beat the Briton to win the gold-medal battle over the two days. The 25-year-olds are head and shoulders above the rest having scored 8,777 points during the West German world champion ship qualifying competition in Bernhausen on June 5. This bettered Thompson's previous mark by 34 points, but the Uerdingden sports student was not being lulled into any false sense of security by his record-breaking performance. "I was only trying to qualify," he said. "It won't be serious until the World Championships. That's the real test." Hingsen is conscious of how he finished well behind Thompson to take the silver medal at the Europe-an Championships in Greece last year, when the Briton rubbed more salt into the wound by also snatching his world record with 8,743.

The 100 meters, long jump, shot put, high jump and 400 meters are the scheduled decathlon events Friday, with Saturday's program rounded out by the 110-meter hurdles, discus throw, pole vault, javelin and 1,500 meters.

LOUISVILLE, Kentucky (UPI) — Greg Page, the World Boxing Council's No. 1 heavyweight contender, has demanded that Larry Holmes be required to fight him or surrender his title.

The demand was issued Thursday by Page's attorney, J. Bruce Miller of Louisville, in a telegram to the WBC commissioner, José Sulaiman of Mexico City. Miller said that the WBC had failed to enforce an earlier directive to Holmes to meet a July 21 deadline for signing to fight Page or face the loss of his title.

"Sportsmen in this country owe an obligation to the sporting public . . . to foster, to encourage and to create quality competition at the championship level," Miller said in the telegram.

Owners Deeply Shaken by Continuing Drug Problems

By Bart Barnes

Washington Post Service WASHINGTON - The National Football League, for decades a paragon of integrity and efficiency on the American sports scene, is facing the 1983 season amid suspicions, uncertainties and controver-

Following the first full weekend of preseason play, league officials and owners remain deeply shaken by continuing charges of illegal drug use by NFL players, and there is sharp disagreement about how to deal with the problem.

"It's a cloud hanging over the game," says Jim Heffernan, the NFL's director of public relations. While there is no evidence that the integrity of an NFL contest has ever been compromised because of player involvement with illegal drugs, Commissioner Pete Rozelle says the issue poses a threat to public confidence in the game. "Such involvment may also give rise to pressures on players to alter their performance on the field in the interests of illegal gamblers," he said in a recent statement.

Last season's 57-day players strike was finally settled when the league and the NFL Players Association agreed on a five-year, $1.6-billion contract, but there is a difference of opinion over whether the ffects of the walkout linger.

While the games of many teams continue to sell out, others are finding lagging sales and declining fan interest. The Kansas City Chiefs, for example, have sold only 28,500 season tickets this year, down from a high of 70,000 in the early 1970s. The Baltimore Colts have sold 23,500, a slight decline from last

The Rudity of Nudity

By Russell Baker

TEW YORK — The deplorable fashion of converting every social issue into a legal dispute about constitutional rights has now infected the United States's nuclists.

Subject to aesthetics and hygiene.

We must delve deeper, deeper than aesthetics and hygiene and constitutional rights. We must delve deeper, deeper than aesthetics and hygiene. In New York, and doubtless many other states with oceanic abutbare at the seashore have been seeking confrontations with the police, apparently in hopes of getting their case up to the Supreme Court. This is the kind of question that used to be settled by Emily Post and Amy Vanderbilt. Now we need several million dollars worth of lawyers to dispose of it.

In the absence of the late arbiters Post and Vanderbilt, I herewith offer to save a lot of money and time by pointing out that this is a fairly common example of the sort of case in which it is necessary to go beyond the constitutional issue.

usually is with these social con-flicts. Everyone, I believe, will concede that there is a constitutional right to sit at a hostess's dining table, strip off your shirt if it's a hot night and sit there in your undershirt belching vociferously unhealthy repressions. throughout dinner. But is this a right you really want to exercise?

Theoreticians of nudism will object to the analogy. Belching is ugly, they will probably say, but human flesh is beautiful, and it is both physically and psychically healthy to give it free run of the open air. We are not speaking now of nudists who prefer to use "nude beaches." but of those who insist on the right to use the entire seashore as their health resort.

I reject the argument that the human body is more beautiful than belching. In certain cultures, a good belch is as highly admired as a well-rounded set of lower abdominal muscle

I think of an uncle of mine who felt quite natural about belching at the dinner table because he was convinced that it was very hygienic for the digestive organs.

On the other hand, he would have been appalled if his grandmother, asserting the right to profit from audity's hygienic benefit to the human hide, had come to the courtesy. And what is courtesy but the art of not making your fellow ments, people who like to be utterly human beings feel uncomfortable when there is no necessity to do so?

> Let me speak personally, as one who does feel uncomfortable when subjected to nudity in public places. There are occasions when, despite this discomfort. I do not consider nudity discourteous.

Suppose, for example, a drowning man screams for help in the ocean and his ones are heard by a magnificent swimmer who has been discreetly sunbathing in her pelt back in the privacy of the dunes. There is nothing thoughtless or rude about her racing nude The deeper issue is courtesy, as it across the beach to make the res-

> "If you weren't rife with disgust-ingly unhealthy repressions," they will say, "you would be able to enjoy life like we do."

What could be more discour teous than flaunting your splendid health in front of an unhealthy man? How many of us, after all, tramp through hospital wards packed with patients whose hearts, livers and kidneys are failing just to let the wretched devils see what healthy specimens we are?

Not many of us. I bet, would pause before a stranger whose last kidney was going and say, "If you didn't have two disgustingly sick kidneys you would be able to enjoy life like I do."

We have a constitutional right to gloat over the unheathy anywhere, and it is not confined to the beach. Why don't more people exercise it? Because of a law that goes beyond the Constitution: good taste.

I know my repressions are unhealthy. Common courtesy should restrain others from flaunting their good fortune on the beach in front of the unhealthily repressed.

an American classic.

For all his bombast and the bravado, there's still something very seriously grand about the gny. When the wind blew his hairpiece off at the Kentucky Derby, Cosell kept talking the way the noble six hundred kept charging into the Valley of Death. His not to reason why, although he does reason why on frequent occasion.

You know what the major problem with television is in this country?" Cosell asks rhetorically. "It's not television's problem. The problem is the lowness of the mass intelligence quotient. What do you do? How do you bring quality to a medium? It's a major

During baseball season, Cosell is usually relatively quiet. He dis-likes baseball, but he has his new weekly Saturday-afternoon ABC magazine show, "Sportsbeat," to occupy him now, and he loves doing it. "He wants it to be his legacy," says a co-worker. "Sportsbeat" has proven itself a first-rate sports broadcast, one that Cosell claims scoops newspaper sports sections regularly.

Cosell brings almost frightening energy to tasks like this, but one must venture to ask: Is the champion thinking about stepping down, about possible retirement? "My wife and I talk about it every day," Cosell says. "We're both convinced that if I just retired, I'd dry up." Where would be go if he did retire? "Isn't it funny, that's been the subject of conversation in my home for the last five days."

Although his wife's name is Mary Edith, Cosell has long called her "Emmie" (for the initials M.E.). Next year they will celebrate their 40th wedding anniversary.

Cosell considers himself trapped in sports, a field be feels is basically unworthy of him. When his guest at lunch says, Tm not the greatest sports fan in the world," Cosell says, "The problem is, neither am I." On the air, he is starting to look not old, but older. The grayed temples, the fried-egg eyes, the occasional punching-bag voice — how does the man do it? How does he keep going? When he does retire, he will retire undefeated. There is no No. I contender.

How much more Cosell will do depends on other things besides his moods and the muse, though he will definitely play a pivotal role in ABC's coverage of the 1984 Olympics. Close viewers of his may have noticed, in appearances over the last several months, a trembling in his hands that makes him look ill, perhaps seriously. But asked about his health, Cosell says "It's spectacular." The occasional trembling is, he says, something that occurs when he is "fatigued" and is not a symptom of a disease.

The people who work for Co-sell at "Sportsbeat" do not worry about his health; they worry about their own. The man is a hurricane who blows lesser souls away. "He's up every morning at 5 o'clock running around like a madman," says Pete Bonventre, field reporter for the show and formerly managing editor at the now defunct "Inside Sports" magazine.

"Howard is a one-man newsroom. Anything that happens in sports, he finds out about it before anyone else," Bonventre says. "That's always invigorating. It's better than having your own UPI wire in your office. He jumps on every story the minute it happens, whether we're going to cover it on the show or not."

The lunch with Cosell took place on a day that Cosell had come to Washington to testify before a House of Representatives subcommittee considering federal regulation of boxing. Earlier. Cosell had announced, on the air, that he would no longer do ringside work at boxing matches. In a 20-minute speech that he ad-libbed, he told the subcommittee that "this quaemire. this mess, that is professional boxing today" is "a desperately sick sport" that has shown resis tance to reform for "decade upon decade," and he quoted de Toc-queville and John Stuart Mill to

Sportscaster Cosell: "You can only do so much."

Cosell recently went before the cameras not for a sportscast but as guest star in the Woody Allen lm "Broadway Danny Rose," the one to be released after the current "Zelig." Cosell says he and Allen go back to Midwood High School in Brooklyn — not as classmates, but it's their mutual alma mater.

"Woody and I have great rapport." Cosell says. "He is a rabid sports fan, a rabid boxing fan as vell. When I went over to the Waldorf for the filming, he said to me, 'As much as I love Ali, Howard, you're right about boxing.' Woody's great — except for going to that terrible Elaine's every night."

Cosell played himself in Allen's "Bananas" (typecasting, but a consummate performance), but in Allen's "Sleeper," set in the next century, people look at a film of Howard Cosell talking on TV and try to figure out what function this had for their ancestors. They decide it must have been some form of torture.

That was not Woody Allen tak-ing a whack at him, Cosell says, just Woody Allen "having fun." Cosell sometimes pretends to have no sense of humor about himself, but in fact, he has a rich one. Also, a sense that the world is mad. And getting madder all the time. "George Steinbrenner sent my wife two decorator pillows," Cosell says. "One said, "Oh Lord, give me a bastard with ta-lent.' And the other said, 'Living well is the best revenge.' I kind of like those. My wife loves them."

Taking his leave, Howard Cosell looks fit and satisfied and irreverently legendary, which he

"I'm in the December of my years," he had said reflectively. But if he retires, he'll be leaving the field to all the lesser men, the little men, the peepers and the putterers. Doesn't that worry him a little? "No. You can only do so much," he says grandly. Cosell is not part of an era; he is an era. When that era ends, bad news. The successors all look smaller than life; Cosell is bigger. For a shark, to eat is to live. For Cosell, to talk is to live. And to work is to live. We must keep this man talk-

Briton in Tiny Sailboat Claims Atlantic Record

The British sailor Tom McClean stepped ashore at Oporto, Portugal, to claim his third trans-Atlantic record after a storm-crossed voyage in a sailboat the size of a bathtub. The 41-year-old former British army commando docked weary but cheerful after 62 days, 10 hours at sea in his 7-foot-9-inch (2.36-meter) yacht Giltspur, the smallest craft ever to sail the Atlantic. McClean, who had previously set marks rowing and sailing the Atlantic single-handed, set out from St. John's, Newfoundland, on June 6.

Prime Minister Margaret Thatcher of Britain has the 20ahead to launch her annual vacation later this week despite the problems she has been having with her right eye. The prime minister underwent surgery last week to repair a torn retina. The surgeon, Dr. Richard Packard, gave her a clean bill of health. Thatcher and her husband, Denis, will set out Friday for a two-week stay in Switzerland.
